Dear Mr. Elsila:

Please send me 25 copies of the Fall, 1966 issue of Changing Education ("The Negro and American Education"). If there is a charge, please bill me accordingly.

Under separate cover I am sending you some materials on "intercultural textbooks" developed by the Virginia Council on Human Relations and our own study of school desegregation in 1966.

Can you tell me if papers or summaries of the "Racism in Education" Conference (December 8-10) are available?

Dear Mr. Via:

We are temporarily out of copies of the Fall issue of Changing Education but will send the 25 copies which you requested as soon as we have more in stock.

You will be interested in knowing that a complete summary of the Racism in Education Conference is being published in the January issue of the American Teacher now on the press. If you will tell me how many copies you need I will be happy to see that you get them.

In addition, the AFT is contemplating publishing the complete conference proceedings as a book.

Dear Emory,

I am writing to ask a favor of you. For the past several weeks I have been in Greensboro, N.C. working with a drive among seven plants of Cone Textile Mills. There have been paper locals in these plants for a number of years and the drive is trying to build up something substaintial. The old contracts ran out a couple of years ago and the drive centers around negotiations for new ones.

The representative, Peter Brandon, has developed some techniques which seem to be working quite well here. One is that decisions are made through a Joint Policy Committee which is composed of the leadership of all the locals. Another is that of the short strike(or controlled strike) which is a strike protesting company violations of the National Labor Relations Act. So far they have had two such strikes, a one day one in October, and a three day one about two weeks ago. The last one was about 73% effective. The third technique is that of community involvement. There have been meetings with ministers and students, and during the last strike about two hundred students walked the picket lines.

The Southern director, Scott Hoyman, wants to see more student and community involvement. He has asked me to come on staff to work on this angle and I have sent an application into New York. Scott asked me to ask some people to write references to try to speed things up a little in the New York office, and I was wondering if you felt that you could write me one. If you can, it should be addressed to:

Paul Swaity
TWUA, AFL-CIO
99 University Place
New York 3, New York

I am enclosing some information on the drive here. Apparently the newsletter has proved to be one of the most effective organizing tools in the situation. It has been coming out regularly since the early fall and now most is written by people in the locals.

I really do appreciate any help you can give me on this, and I hope that you may be able to find time to come here to Greensboro to see for yourself what is going on here. The locals are trying to start an education program and I am planning to send you the information on that as soon as it is drawn up. Thanks for your help.

I would be pleased to work with such sessions especially as they relate to politics, civil rights, and community participation. The details can be discussed later by phone or otherwise.

Dear Mr. Via:

I enjoyed reading your statement at the Textile Employment Forum concerning job discrimination and promotional opportunities for Negroes. Some of the problems particularly associated with technological change in the textile industry are similar to those we face in the Federal service.

In the light of your broad experience in this field, I would like to extend an invitation to participate in the AFGE Southern Leadership School to be held at the University of the South the week of August 6th - 11th, 1967 at Sewanee, Tennessee.

This is the initial AFGE Workers Education Weeklong Resident School to be held for AFGE lodge officers, stewards and members from our Fourth (Maryland, Virginia, West Virginia and North Carolina) and Fifth Districts, (Tennessee, South Carolina, Alabama, Georgia and Florida). I anticipate that we will have in excess of 100 AFGE lodge leaders and activists at this program from this region.

At present, in addition to myself, Otto Pragan, Assistant Director of the AFL-CIO Education Department, AFGE organizers and Bob Repas, Michigan State University and Stan Rosen of University of Illinois who have been asked to instruct in the program, will compose the Staff.

The course will cover all aspects of collective bargaining in the Federal service and effective grievance representation, during the morning sessions of the program. The afternoon sessions will be divided equally between lodge administration (parliamentary procedure, internal and external communications and public relations) and Labor's Role in Changing America.

This portion of the program would deal with the history of the labor movement in the Government and private sector in our society with particular emphasis on the problems facing working people today. I hope you will consider handling this part of the weeklong school.

These sessions will concentrate on contemporary problems and the labor movement, support of Civil Rights, poverty programs, Federal Aid to education and urban renewal. The instructor in this portion of the program will teach two separate sessions of ninety minutes each day for four days, Monday through Thursday (August 7th - 10th.) Lodge delegates will be divided into two separate groups and the instructors in the concurrent afternoon sessions would exchange classes so that everyone will have an opportunity to attend the sessions on Lodge Administration and Labor's Role in Changing America.

Please advise me if you can be with us at this important AFGE Seminar.

Dear Paul:

I haven't seen you since the Textile Employment Forum in Charlotte back in January. We still hope to see some action in that situation from several government agencies. Al Kehrer or I will certainly be in touch with you and others in TWUA when something develops.

Sometime ago I heard from Gene Guerrero that he was being considered for a staff position with the TWUS. Subsequently I have had occasions to talk with Scott Hoyman and Jim Pierce. I think that Guerrero is a good fellow. He is steady, reasonable, and dedicated. Such types are few and far between. Although one might not classify Gene as a world leader, I feel confident that you would find him a useful staff addition and he would bring a good bit of relevant experience from the Student Movement to labor organizing. As you know working with labor has been a concern of his for a couple of years. Some of the things he has already done I think have been quite worth while.

It could be that this situation has already been settled in some way, but I thought I would put in a word or two myself.

Dear Mr. Simcich:

Your letter to Mr. Leslie Dunbar has been refered to me for an answer. Mr. Dunbar is no longer with the Council but serves as the staff head of the Field Foundation in New York. Mr. Paul Anthony is the Council's Executive Director.

Under separate cover I am sending you a copy of the most recent issue of our quarterly magazine, "The New South". A few other publications by and about the Council will also be included. There will be no charge for these materials but I would urge you to subscribe to "The New South" for $3.00 per year.

I trust that in recent weeks you have received at least two mailings from my own program. One was a statement coming out of the bomb-killing of a Negro union member in Natchez, Mississippi and the other was a copy of our newly developed "Minimum Wage Campaign Kit".

The Labor Program works with a wide variety of unions and State AFL-CIOs in the South. Our main focus is on education programs which relate to understanding the changing South, race relations and Civil Rights. Frequently these topics are mixed with more basic union courses such as steward's training and local union administration. Beyond this we do a great deal of work of a consulting nature with unions and a good bit of liason work between unions and other groups interested in civil rights. I work closely with both the Education Department and Civil Rights Department of the National AFL-CIO. You may be interested to know that I am a long time member of the AFT Local 189 and an active participant in the University Labor Education Association. I am currently on leave from the School for Workers of the University of Wisconsin.

Some of the other programs of the Council work on problems of Voter Education and Registration, Juvenile Delinquency, and Criminal Rehabilitation, Housing and Urban Planning and Community Organizations and Self-Help Projects. These efforts and others are undergirded by a fairly substantial information program of research and publications.

We work over a geographic area which includes the eleven Southern states. We work cooperatively with State Human Relations Councils in ten states. These Councils were originally created by the Southern Regional Council and still receive assistance from us. We also work cooperatively with a large number of other organizations throughout the South including Civil Rights groups, local voter groups, churches, and unions.

I think the other publications I will be sending you will help fill in a bit more on the Council itself. Please be in touch with us if we can ever be of any service.

Dear Emory,

I ran into Ed Stanfield at the N.C. Human Relations dinner a couple of weeks ago and mentioned to him a conference coming up in Greensboro. He said that you and he might be able to drive up from Atlanta for it.

As you can see from the enclosed leaflets the conference will be bringing together workers, students, and liberal minded people from across the state to talk about textile workers rights. As far as I know it is the first time this has happened in a while in North Carolina and those of us involved in some way are pretty excited about it. Hopefully the conference will serve as something of a kickoff to a broad movement in the state.

I really hope that you and Ed will be able to come. I know that it will be of interest to you and that you can be a very helpful to the conference itself.

In looking over the conference agenda, if you have any suggestions or ideas, please let me know. Hope to see you there.

I had hoped to send you one of the manuals we have been using in our Legislative Conferences with our members each Friday night and with the Senators and Representatives at a luncheon the following day for our members to talk with them. We exhausted our supply but are trying to have some more made up for the use of our people when they talk to their representatives individually. As soon as we get some more made up I will send you one of these to let you see what we are attempting to do on a minimum wage law, control of Private Employment Agencies, Little Norris-LaGuardia Act, amendments to Workmen's Compensation and Unemployment Compensation, etc.

Dear Mr. Kane:

Several names come to mind as possible program participants for your Southern Leadership School on labor history and the problems facing working pepple today. First I would suggest Professor Ray Marshall, Department of Economics, University of Texas, Austin, Texas. Marshall knows unions well and is the outstanding expert on Southern labor history and is quite conversant with contemporary problems of unions including the problems of social change and civil rights.

Secondly, I would suggest E.T. (Al) Kehrer who is the Southern staff man of the AFL-CIO Civil Rights Department. Kehrer is located at 40 Marietta Street, N.W., Atlanta, Georgia. His past experience includes being the Regional Director for the ILGWU and having worked as an Assistant Director for the old ILGWU Training Institute.

A third suggestion would be Dr. Earl Williams who directs the Human Resources Institute at the University of Houston in Houston, Texas. Williams used to be at the University of Tennessee, he is a labor economist, and like Marshall and Kehrer has been widely used in southern labor education institutes.

Two other persons might prove to be useful. I believe you know them both. Neither has had any special experience in the South. They are IrvingBBrotslaw and Owen Tapper both of the School for Workers staff at the University of Wisconsin.

Under separate cover I am sending you a variety of materials which you may find of some use in the institute. If so please let me know in what quantity you will need them. In some cases a charge would need to be made.

Best wishes in your further planning for your southern school.

Heart Attack Takes Life Of ICWU Chief Mitchell

Walter L. Mitchell, president of International Chemical Workers Union, died of a heart attack Sept. 19, near the end of a convention of his union in New Orleans.

He had just presided over four days of what had been hailed as an unusually successful convention and had been reelected ICWU President without opposition. Shortly after adjournment of the day's convention session, he collapsed in his hotel room and died within a short time in a New Orleans hospital.

Because of the mutuality of interest between OCAW and ICWU, Mitchell was well known to many OCAW members and was respected by them as a hard-working, intelligent union leader.

Mitchell had been president of ICWU since 1946. He was 53 at the time of his death.

As of the press time of this issue of UNION NEWS, it was not reported who would replace him as president of the union. Presumably a selection will be made by the Executive Board, under ICWU's normal constitutional procedures for filling vacancies between convention elections.

Eureka Pipe Line Boosts Pay 40c

The 145 production and maintenance workers of Eureka Pipe Line Co., Parkersburg, W.Va., will receive pay raises totaling 40 cents an hour during the next two years, in addition to other improvements. They are members of Mannington, W.Va., Local 3-693.

Mileage allowance was increased by 1 cent per mile and improvements were made in vacations, retirement plan and hospitalization.

The committee consisted of H. H. Ferrell, Ralph Williams, Dale E. Powell, Thomas E. Joliff and Roy Pyles. Intl. Rep. Samuel Lopez led negotiations.

NEW PRESIDENTS of AFL-CIO unions are Timothy J. O'Sullivan, left, of the Broadcast Employes & Technicians, and Thomas E. Boyle of the Chemical Workers. O'Sullivan won a three-year term at the NABET convention in Chicago. Boyle was chosen by the ICWU executive board to serve a four-year term as successor to Walter L. Mitchell, who died unexpectedly after his re-election.

Trainmen are back at Chicago's Belt Ry., but dispute over crew size goes on.

Back on the track in Chicago

Trains will run while government probes union-Belt Ry. dispute. Outcome may govern crew size for many carriers

Switching service is normal again on the small, busy Belt Ry. Co. of Chicago, but the train crew dispute that led to a 102-day strike is far from over. Railroaders say union demands for an extra man in present two-man crews would be a return to "featherbedding" that ended in 1963.

The Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen struck the Belt Ry. on July 29, shutting down switching service on the 27-mi. line. BRT demanded that the railroad increase switching crews to three men for safety reasons.

The Belt Ry., owned by 12 major railroads using its services, rejected the demand. It contended the 75 extra men who would have to be hired were not needed and that they would add $1-million yearly to labor costs. In lieu of the second helper, the line offered pay hikes to those working in two-man crews, but the union retorted that the Belt Ry. couldn't "buy off jobs."

Support. The National Railway Labor Conference, which represents carriers in labor negotiations, pledged full support to the Belt Ry. And John P. Hiltz, Jr., its chairman, charged that unions have picked the Belt Ry. for a stepped-up fight to restore "unnecessary" jobs eliminated five years ago. Hiltz called BRT's pressures against the Belt Ry. and then other roads an "outrageous attempt at featherbedding . . . to force them to hire new people, with no previous connection with the industry, to fill jobs that are absolutely unnecessary."

BRT declined to comment specifically on the dispute while it is before an emergency board, but it said that "over 30 Eastern railroads and eight of the 12 carriers that jointly own the Belt Ry. have already signed contracts allowing us one conductor and two brakemen on each train." A spokesman added, "This isn't a new effort, or a resurgence. We've been working for years to restore the original number of crewmen. We hope this is the end of the long road."

Background. In 1963, carriers won a fight to cut firemen from diesel engines in freight and yard service. When unions moved to call a nationwide strike, Congress passed special legislation barring a walkout and ordering arbitration with a two-year limit on the award. An estimated 20,000 to 25,000 firemen and other workers were dropped from train crews between 1963 and 1965.

The two-year limit expired in 1965. Since then, the unions have been working with some success to win back jobs. The BRT estimates that about two-thirds of the industry has gone back to the "safe" number of crewmen. The Belt Ry. dispute is an effort to break the resistance of other roads.

Intervention. The Belt Ry.'s 425 switchmen and other unionists quit July 29 because, they complained, two-man crews were unsafe in the dense Chicago-area railroad traffic and the workload was too heavy. The stoppage quickly developed into an endurance contest.

The Belt Ry. serves 310 industries. All were affected, but few agree on how seriously they were hurt. Many plants found alternative ways to route shipments by rail. Others turned to trucking. In either case, costs were higher.

The government was asked to intervene under the Railway Labor Act, but for two months the White House called the strike a local matter that didn't threaten interstate commerce. Labor hailed the attitude, but the U.S. Chamber of Commerce and others accused the Johnson Administration of playing politics by refusing to act prior to a Presidential election.

Then, the day after voting, President Johnson set in motion Railway Labor Act emergency-strike procedures, noting that the dispute had just spread to the Illinois Central RR and Louisville & Nashville RR. He named an emergency board, and the BRT sent strikers back to work for a 60-day period.

Precedent? Hearings started in Washington this week. The three-man board hopes to wind up sessions before Thanksgiving and to press for a compromise settlement before the late-December deadline. If there is a settlement, it likely will become a precedent for other roads where BRT demands extra crewmen.

A bigger question is whether the outcome will have any impact in the battle over Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen demands to put firemen back into diesel cabs. The union's argument is the same as the BRT's: that a safety hazard has been created.

Carriers deny any hazard in smaller crews. They contend the union fight is an effort to slow technological advances in an industry that must make maximum use of improved technology to survive.

Meanwhile, a Supreme Court decision this week upheld state "full crew" laws that bar roads in five states from eliminating firemen and other crewmen under the 1963 arbitration award. The laws set minimum crew numbers on a public safety basis. Rail unions will now broaden efforts to win further state legislation that would restore jobs.

The AFL-CIO boycotted an executive board meeting of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions in Brussels this week, to allow the board "an independent decision" on whether to admit the now-independent United Auto Workers to the world labor body. The federation says the international group's constitution bars admitting the auto workers without federation approval—and AFL-CIO's George Meany has said a firm and final no to "admitting the split in U. S. labor into the world organization." UAW's Walter Reuther wants the union accepted into ICFTU because it was a founding member.

Pennsylvanians voted in a referendum last spring to require compulsory arbitration of disputes involving policemen and firemen. Now they have had a jolt: Separate arbitration panels in pay cases involving Pittsburgh policemen and firemen awarded increases of 20% and 30% respectively—and the city, already facing a $5.5-million budget deficit, can't see where the money can come from. It wants emergency help from the state to avoid "a devastating effect on economic stability" from the raises. Meanwhile, other municipalities in or facing arbitrations are considering questioning the legality of any arbitration that doesn't take into account the municipality's budget situation.

Dementy Chrysler - hold.

Age is continuing to change faces in labor. This week, Joseph V. Moreschi, 80-plus, stepped down as head of the Laborers International Union, to become president-emeritus, and Peter Fosco, 75, secretary-treasurer, replaced him in the top job of the expanding union. Terence O'Sullivan, 38, formerly a vice-president, moved into the No. 2 job.

Witchcraft charges brought against the International Assn. of Machinists by General Cigar Co. in a dispute in Puerto Rico have been dismissed by the regional office of the National Labor Relations Board. NLRB's Puerto Rican district director said that if IAM organizers sought assistance of "brujas" (witches) they did it secretly and "employees apparently did not treat it seriously."

In one instance, a "magic potion" was found to be a headache remedy. More routine charges against IAM also were tossed out. General Cigar may appeal the decision to the full NLRB.

Speaking of Business

If Unions Unite, Isn't That a Conglomerate?

4/19/69
Wall St. Journal

By LINDLEY H. CLARK JR.

While corporations have been conglomerating all over the place, a similar movement is under way among labor unions. The two developments, however, have stirred markedly different reactions from Washington.

One of the earliest and largest of the highly diverse corporate enterprises, Ling-Temco-Vought Inc., soon must go to court to explain why it isn't violating the antitrust laws by trying to add Jones & Laughlin Steel Corp. to its collection. If the Justice Department manages to block this new merger, marriage plans of other large corporate conglomerates may well go astray.

What concerns the Government about the L-T-V deal is the company's growing economic power.

As in other business conglomerations, the result could be either good or bad for the economy. Jones & Laughlin is only middling large as steel companies go, and perhaps Ling-Temco resources could make it a more effective competitor. Perhaps, too, a further broadening of L-T-V's already broad business horizon would make the company more stable, less susceptible to general economic downturns.

Economic power, nonetheless, can't be lightly ignored; all too often it can lead to monopolistic abuse. That's why it's a little surprising that the courts and Federal officials, those supposed guardians of the public interest, seem so little concerned by what's going on among labor unions.

Labor's statesmen, of course, don't refer to their activity as conglomeration; the term that has crept into common usage is coalition bargaining. The tactic has become so widespread that the University of Pennsylvania's Wharton School has just published a book about it, "Coalition Bargaining," by William N. Chernish.

Sensibly enough, Dr. Chernish begins by explaining what he's talking about: "Coalition bargaining is the joining together of a number of local unions, having different international affiliations, for the purpose of bargaining with a company or an industry as a single unit."

Like a lot of important economic developments, coalition bargaining did not spring up overnight. Coalition, or at least closely coordinated, bargaining is well established on the railroads, in the printing trades and elsewhere. In 1964, though, the AFL-CIO's Industrial Union Department decided it was time to get really organized, and it set up a division to encourage coalitions.

If unions want to get together, why don't they follow the more formal route and merge? One answer is institutional, and it isn't peculiar to unions. When two organizations combine into one, in labor or any other field, there's room for only a single set of officers. To put it bluntly, union presidents seldom will cheerfully give up their jobs.

Another answer is simply tradition. The name of the International Brotherhood of Pulp, Sulphite and Paper Mill Workers of the United States and Canada may have no sentimental ring for you or me, but then neither of us is likely to be a member of good old IBPSPMW; if we were, we might feel differ-

If unions want to get together, why don't they follow the more formal route and merge? One answer is institutional, and it isn't peculiar to unions. When two organizations combine into one, in labor or any other field, there's room for only a single set of officers. To put it bluntly, union presidents seldom will cheerfully give up their jobs.

Another answer is simply tradition. The name of the International Brotherhood of Pulp, Sulphite and Paper Mill Workers of the United States and Canada may have no sentimental ring for you or me, but then neither of us is likely to be a member of good old IBPSPMW; if we were, we might feel differently.

In any case, the unions think they have found a way to achieve many of the benefits of wedded bliss without actually going through the ceremony: Coalition. The obvious major benefit is an increase in economic muscle—an increase the unions contend is justified by the growing size and diversity of corporations.

Tactics can vary in confrontations with various companies and industries, but the unions' 1966 battle with General Electric will serve as an illustration. GE, a prime coalition target, bargains with about 80 unions representing 130,000 workers at 150 locations scattered around the country (another 170,000 GE employes are unorganized, plainly a source of irritation to the unions).

A group of eight unions, representing most of GE's organized employes, tried to initiate joint talks but the company refused. Then the International Union of Electrical Workers, the dominant union, proposed discussions limited to GE and IUE. When the company men entered the meeting room, however, they found that the "IUE" group somehow included representatives of all the seven other unions. Whereupon, the GE officials walked out.

Why? Well, it required no special wisdom to recognize that the outsiders, though claiming to represent the IUE, were actually looking after their own unions' interests. The union maneuver plainly was a first step toward winning company-wide negotiations for all the unions, something that only the IUE had until then achieved. That sort of development obviously would weaken GE's bargaining position.

Moreover, company-wide or national bargaining can be anything but good for the individual employes and the general economy. When unions concentrate on national talks, the local problems of the work force often get lost in the shuffle. GE employes scarcely are poorly paid; that's one reason the unions have found it hard to wage effective strikes. Naional bargaining naturally increases the chances for national—and economically disruptive—strikes.

None of this weighed heavily with the National Labor Relations Board. The NLRB held that the "IUE" committee was no more than the union said it was: A group of its own representatives, and never mind those other union connections. A court order was quickly obtained to compel the company to bargain, and a settlement was reached—one that was worth just about what GE initially offered.

Yet the unions see the GE case as a "victory," and perhaps it was in a sense. At least the NLRB appears convinced that a coalition is not a coalition if the unions say it isn't. Though the agency itself certified most GE unions to bargain only for local units—units the unions themselves selected—that consideration is blithely brushed aside. Perhaps bargaining units at times should change, but changes should be made after careful consideration, not by swift and arbitrary administrative decisions.

The legal issues are still not fully resolved, but the unions surely will be trying the coalition approach when GE contracts expire again this year. Companies like General Electric have the resources, and the will, to stand up to union pressure, but the same can't be said for smaller manufacturers who will be forced to go along with the industry "pattern."

So, whatever the Government does about corporate conglomerates, the pressure for a similar form of unionism seems likely to continue.

RWDSU Report 4/13/69

PICKETS PROTEST JAILINGS: Workers of the Medical College Hospital in Charleston march to protest jailing of strikers. In the first day of strike 130 arrests were made.

S. C. Hospital Strikers Gain Wide Community Support

CHARLESTON, S.C. — Four hundred and twenty-five strikers at the Medical College Hospital of South Carolina and 125 more at the Charleston City Hospital, nearly all Negroes, are gaining strong labor and community support as their struggle for recognition of the RWDSU as bargaining agent entered its fourth week.

The Concerned Clergy of Charleston has made several proposals for "peace with justice," and it has called on the Medical College Hospital to reinstate 12 workers it discharged. The hospital's firing of the 12, who include union Pres. Mary Moultrie, sparked the walk-out March 20.

Among union groups giving strong backing to the strikers are the state AFL-CIO, the Charleston Building Trades Council and the National Maritime Union. The RWDSU has donated $1,000 to the strikers.

Other groups backing the workers include the Young Democrats and several other Charleston political groups, the National Ass'n for the Advancement of Colored People and the Charleston Business and Professional Men's Ass'n.

The Rev. Dr. Ralph Abernathy, head of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, and the Rev. Andrew Young of the conference spoke at a meeting March 31 at the Fourth Baptist Church in support of the hospital workers.

Other speakers at the rally, which drew a crowd of 2,000, were Al Holman, state NAACP head, and E. T. Kirkland, secretary-treasurer of the state's labor council.

More than $1,000 for the strikers was raised at the meeting.

Aid is also coming from ordinary citizens.

"People walk in off the street and give a bag of sandwiches for the strikers," a union spokesman said.

The main issue in the walk-out is union recognition. The Medical College Hospital refuses to recognize the union. It claims that South Carolina law makes it illegal for a state institution to recognize a union and bargain with it. The City Hospital is using a similar legalism.

Richard Black, the Charleston County manager, said, "The facts are simple. The county will not recognize the union."

The state attorney general has given a vague opinion that the hospitals' position is "based on legal principle."

Governor Indifferent

Gov. Robert McNair appointed one member of a supposedly three-man investigating commission at a midnight press conference, but has done nothing since.

The union began organizing the Medical College workers more than a year ago, but the hospital has steadily refused to discuss recognition.

The strike began after Dr. William McCord, administrator of the hospital, called 12 union leaders to a meeting. When the workers insisted they wanted a union, McCord fired them. The hospital claims they were discharged for leaving their post.

In the first days of the strike, the police arrested 130 strikers, most for violating an injunction limiting the number of pickets. All jailed strikers have been bailed out.

The police also harassed strikers, and one was badly beaten in a police van after being arrested. He has since returned to the picketlines, which are up from 6 a.m. to 11 p.m.

The strikers have set up a kitchen in the headquarters of RWDSU Local 15—which represents workers at the American Tobacco Co.'s cigar plant here — and several hundred strikers eat at the kitchen every day.

Most of the workers earn only $1.30 an hour, and have poor working conditions.

Isaiah Bennett of Local 15 has been working with the hospital strikers as have several leaders of Local 1199 in New York City, including Hospital Div. Dir. Elliott Godoff and Div. Org. Dir. Henry Nicholas.

The union drive is picking up steam and the union is now signing up workers at six other hospitals in Charleston.

Retail Union Local Breaks From Parent, Elopes With Reuther

By a WALL STREET JOURNAL Staff Reporter

WASHINGTON—Furtive wooing by Walter Reuther broke up one of organized labor's shaky marriages yesterday.

Mr. Reuther, president of the United Auto Workers union, has been quietly courting prospective partners for his Alliance for Labor Action, a joint venture with the Teamsters Union. A tentative engagement was announced in New York City yesterday when the big New York segment and some small locals of the Retail, Wholesale and Department Store Union disclosed they'd broken away from their parent and the AFL-CIO to cooperate with the ALA.

Officials of the retail union's District 65, embracing some 30,000 workers in the New York area, said they had officially disaffiliated from the parent union as of Tuesday. Several smaller locals, which the parent union claimed totaled less than 1,000 members, were taking similar action, District 65 officials said.

The divorce ended District 65's 15-year cohabitation with the parent body. District 65, then known as the Distributive, Processing and Office Workers Union, merged with the retail union in 1954, but the relationship in recent years has been strained by policy differences between District 65 leadership and national union officers.

Mr. Reuther, in a series of secret meetings with District 65 leaders over the past year, apparently won their allegiance with promises of money and organizing aid, and his vow to "revitalize" the labor movement, which Mr. Reuther charges has stagnated under AFL-CIO leadership.

Cleveland Robinson, District 65 secretary-treasurer, said the breakaway group "will remain independent for the time being" rather than formally affiliate with the ALA immediately. "We will be cooperating with the ALA, but they haven't asked us to affiliate now," Mr. Robinson said. However, he added, District 65 expects to send delegates to the first ALA convention in Washington on May 26 and 27.

Mr. Robinson said Mr. Reuther has promised District 65 a grant of $120,000 to expand its organizing activities. With that and the approximately $200,000 a year it will save by not paying dues to the retail union, District 65 plans to add 40 to 50 more organizers and launch new membership campaigns, especially among low-wage minority workers.

The District 65 official said several other retail union locals, principally in the South, were following its lead out of the parent union and would be loosely tied to it and the ALA. A spokesman for the retail union said two locals in Virginia and one in North Carolina, with fewer than 1,000 members, had served notice of disaffiliation.

The parent union spokesman charged the breakaway of District 65 "is their way of resolving their own financial and racial problems." The district leaders "hope to curry favor with their large black and Puerto Rican membership by attacking us on racial grounds," he said. District 65 officials have attacked the parent union's "lily-white" leadership; all five top officers of the union are white, the spokesman said, though two of about 20 executive board members are black.

RETAIL WORKERS SEVER UNION TIES

Local Here Cites Failure to Recruit Minorities

By PETER MILLONES

A union of 30,000 retail workers here withdrew yesterday from its parent union and from the American Federation of Labor-Congress of Industrial Organizations, charging that both organizations had failed to provide "aggressive and progressive leadership" in organizing millions of low-paid Negro and Puerto Rican workers.

District 65, in severing its ties with the Retail, Wholesale and Department Store International Union, said it would work instead with the alliance last year by the United Auto Workers and the teamsters union.

whose membership is about 30 per cent Negro and 25 per cent Puerto Rican, is the latest indication that some city-based unions are dissatisfied with labor's relationship to minority groups.

David Livingston, president of District 65, issued a statement that said:

"There is a tidal wave of effort and feeling on the part of the disenfranchised in this country; organized labor had better waken to this fact and its consequences."

Rise in Locals Predicted

He predicted that "an additional 15,000 to 20,000 workers in other locals around the country will themselves disaffiliate with the Retail, Wholesale and Department Store Union."

District 65, Mr. Livingston said, will earmark about $400,000 and add more than 50 staff members in an effort to organize low-paid workers in the New York area and elsewhere, notably the South.

Mr. Livingston revealed a letter he had received this week from Walter P. Reuther, president of the auto workers, in which Mr. Reuther said that approval had been given to an "interest-free loan of $120,000 to District 65, payable in monthly installments of $10,000 each."

"This will be for the purpose," the letter said, "of assisting District 65 in its organizational activities and it is extended without regard to the status of your organization with respect to the R.W.D.S.U., for we consider this purely an internal matter in which we have no right to be involved."

Mr. Reuther's statement was apparently designed to forestall any charges of "raiding" by the A.F.L.-C.I.O. Mr. Livingston, too, emphasized at a news conference that District 65 would not raid other unions unions for members.

Membership Drive Planned

He said that District 65 would seek to organize some of the 57 million workers who are not members of unions, particularly low-paid Negroes and Puerto Ricans.

Mr. Livingston called the leadership of the A.F.L.-C.I.O. "guilty of gross irrelevance" in not seeing what he suggested was the trend of the times.

"To say you're for civil rights," he asserted, "is not enough anymore; everybody is for civil rights. The oppressed want power and some share of responsibility and they have not generally found relevance in the labor movement."

He chided the international union for being "lily-white." An international official later denied the charge and noted the union's newspaper had replied earlier:

"The accusation of white racism [is] a vicious one, since it is widely acknowledged that the R.W.D.S.U. record in the area of civil rights is a particularly good one."

A spokesman for the A.F.L.-C.I.O. in Washington declined comment.

The disaffiliation move will cost the international union about $200,000 a year in dues. District 65 had been a part of the international since 1954.

When the auto workers withdrew from the A.F.L.-C.I.O. last year, they also criticized the federation for allegedly not taking an up-to-date stand on social issues and civil rights.

Mr. Livingston said his union would first attempt to organize workers in light manufacturing, wholesale trades, direct mail and corrugated box industries.

Potters Elect Lester H. Null As President

East Liverpool, O.—Lester H. Null, Sr., third vice president of the Potters since 1965, was elected president in a membership referendum for a four-year term beginning Aug. 1.

Null is a former president of Potters' Local 220 at the American Radiator & Standard Sanitary plant in New Orleans. He succeeds veteran Pres. Edwin L. Wheatley, who did not run for re-election and will retire soon after the union's annual convention July 7-11 in Anaheim, Calif.

Both Null and Sec.-Treas. George Barbaree won in contested races. Seven incumbent vice presidents were returned to office and two were defeated. New officers are Vice Presidents Jacob F. Schwab of New Orleans, succeeding Null; Joseph Galvin, Jr. of Pomona, N.J., and Thomas A. Shuman of Tiffin, O.

Null began his rise to national office when Wheatley named him an international representative in 1958. He serviced many local unions in the South, and often was assigned to assist elsewhere as a "troubleshooter" in organizing and bargaining.

Null was born in Hahn, Mo., May 21, 1924.

Minority-Group Store Workers Set Union; AFL-CIO Dissidents to Align With Reuther

By JAMES P. GANNON

Staff Reporter of THE WALL STREET JOURNAL

WASHINGTON — A new, national "catch-all" union, aligned with Walter Reuther's Alliance for Labor Action, will be formed this weekend.

The new union, comprised of segments of the Retail, Wholesale and Department Store Union that have broken away from their AFL-CIO parent body, will take shape at a weekend conference in Suffolk, Va. Planners of the organization claim it will be the first major union with a membership predominantly of minority groups; a black man is expected to be named to its top office.

Tentative plans for the union, to be called the National Council of Wholesale, Retail, Office and Processing Workers of America, were disclosed by sources in the former District 65 segment of the AFL-CIO Retail-Wholesale Union. The New York-based District 65, with about 30,000 members, will be the nucleus of the union, which, organizers claim, will have an initial membership of about 45,000 members.

Some 15 other locals that have broken away from the AFL-CIO Retail-Wholesale union also will be charter members of the National Council. They include locals from Suffolk; Newport News, Va.; Charleston, S.C.; Charlotte, N.C.; Detroit; Memphis; Newark, N.J.; Jersey City; Los Angeles; Tallahassee and Jacksonville, Fla., and other cities. District 65 is heavily Negro and Puerto Rican. The locals have predominantly black membership.

The new union will receive money and organizing manpower from Mr. Reuther's United Auto Workers and the Teamsters Union, which joined in forming the Alliance for Labor Action, a rival to the AFL-CIO. The alliance plans to hold its first national conference in Washington next Monday and Tuesday.

The new union won't be formally affiliated with the ALA, at least at first, but will be closely allied to the UAW-Teamster partnership. District 65 already has received $120,000 from the UAW to expand organizing, and both the UAW and the Teamsters have pledged to make staff organizers available for the National Council's membership campaign.

The National Council will aim its organizing primarily at low-wage workers, especially Negroes, Mexican-Americans, Puerto Ricans and other minority groups. Planners envision a broad jurisdiction unhampered by industry or craft lines. "We're a catch-all," said one. The new union's leaders are mapping an ambitious campaign in 50 cities, and aim at doubling their membership in a year.

Plans for the union are subject to approval of delegates from the charter locals at the weekend conference in Suffolk, but no substantial change in the tentative outline is expected. Delegates also will elect officers, with the likelihood of naming minority-group members to the highest posts. The top office, either chairman or president, is expected to go to a Negro; Cleveland Robinson, secretary-treasurer of District 65, is a likely choice.

Assignment of IAM Vice Presidents Beginning July 1

IAM President-elect Floyd E. Smith has announced his intention to make the following assignment of territories to Vice Presidents when he takes office July 1.

Assignment of Vice Presidents to territories is the responsibility of the International President under the IAM Constitution.

George L. Watkins—South-Central territory, five states. Headquarters, Dallas, Tex.

Mike Rygus—Canada. Headquarters, Ottawa, Ont.

Gilbert Brunner—Midwest territory, nine states plus Lake County, Ind. and the Upper Peninsula of Mich. Headquarters, Des Plaines, Ill.

Charles West—Resident Vice President at Headquarters, Washington, D.C.

L. Ross Mathews—Northeast territory, eleven states. Headquarters, Bergenfield, N.J.

William W. Winpisinger—Transportation industries. Headquarters, Washington, D.C.

Robert R. Simpson—Southwest territory, six states plus El Paso County, Tex. Headquarters, Long Beach, Calif.

Frederick J. Purcell—Great Lakes-Southern territory, 12 states plus Panama Canal Zone and Puerto Rico. Headquarters, Cleveland, Ohio.

Francis P. Meagher—Northwest territory, eight states. Headquarters, Bellevue, Wash.

The truth about the summer work-in

By J. Edgar Hoover
Director, Federal Bureau of Investigation
United States Department of Justice

Most Americans in reading news accounts about the student New Left in the country have undoubtedly thought about this movement chiefly in terms of colleges and universities. Our mass media have been filled for months with stories about riots, demonstrations and violence on campuses spearheaded by the most militant New Left group—the Students for a Democratic Society (SDS). The SDS and its followers have left a bitter wake of arson, vandalism, bombings and destruction across the Nation.

This summer the SDS is turning toward labor and industry—and you as members of the International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers may soon be meeting these fanatic, anarchist revolutionaries.

The SDS is launching what it calls a "Work-In" program, whereby SDS militants are being encouraged to obtain summer jobs in industry. They are to seek out large industrial firms, apply for a job, and, if accepted, stay for the summer.

Why this SDS tactic?

The SDS wants to make personal and direct contact with "workers" and "educate" them in the SDS's philosophy, that is, that this country is "rotten," "sick" and "diseased," and therefore should be destroyed. The "working class," says the SDS, is apathetic to the vital necessity for revolution, for opposing the war in Vietnam and resisting the draft. "Throughout the summer," says an SDS document, "there will be a need to put out literature at plants where we are working on the war and draft, the rebellion, the ghettos, and other important issues affecting workers."

While working in industrial and business jobs, the SDS militant is to make a special effort to meet his fellow workers, both his own age and from the older generation. If possible, he is to join the union or at least make as close contact as possible with union members. At all times in these personal contacts, both on and off the job, the SDS member is to attempt to "radicalize" his associates, that is, to encourage them to support the program of the SDS. "We want to combat isolation by explaining what the struggles on our campuses are about and by showing workers that there are students who support their struggles and who want to organize other students to do so."

From affluent families

Many of these young radicals, coming from reasonably affluent homes, have never worked before. Therefore, the SDS has issued a "Work-In Organizers Manual." On the first page is this description:

> "This manual is intended to help WORK-IN organizers in selecting and getting jobs. It also contains some pointers on approaches to the political issues that we will be raising and encountering at work."

The manual sets forth specifics on a number of points, for example, "How to research the job situation in your area," "What jobs to look for," "How to get a job," and "What to expect on the job."

> "Job-seekers," says this manual, "should try to get hired in plants or transport depots that have several hundred (let's say a 400 minimum) workers. Reasons for this include: a) If we want to reach workers with literature, the potential audience is greater; b) The larger the company facility, the better chance that it will be in a basic union, that the workers will have some sense of organization (even if they think the union is a sellout one), and that therefore there will be a tie-in to workers nationally."

Note the use of the phrase "a sellout one" in regard to unions. The SDS has no respect for unions and their efforts to protect the workers and work for the best interests of their country. To the SDS, unions are part of the "Establishment," and should be destroyed along with the Government, the military, private industry and law enforcement. The phrase "sellout unions" means that union members are employed in plants which produce military equipment or other materials used to implement the foreign policy of the United States. Therefore, in SDS eyes, you, as a union member, are a "traitor."

How do you get a job?

> "Some places give aptitude tests. Don't show off. If you're taking the test with other job-seekers, try to see how far (number of questions) they're getting and adjust accordingly. If you do too well, they'll either be suspicious or want to use you in the 'front office.' "

Such arrogance! That they are so much wiser than the man who works in the factory.

> "You should be at your first place looking at around 8:30 or 9 a.m. It's hard to get a job if you start at 2 p.m. You generally should not wear a suit and tie or fancy dress, but DON'T dress like a slob. Slacks and sport shirt, with or without a sport jacket, depending on the weather, and skirt or summer dress with low heels (or at least not 6-inch spikes) for women."

Then this added advice relative to the initial job interview: "Be straightforward in any interview; you're getting the job because you 'need the money.' Don't use $20 words. Don't put on a tough guy act. Just plain, simple language and attitude. Usually the less said, the better. Don't volunteer information. Just answer what is asked."

After the SDS student has been hired, the manual says, he should gradually feel his way. "Don't start sounding off the first day on the job; or even the first week." "Come in to work on time!!! That's the thing that may keep you in the job above all else." "Don't give up the first time you do something wrong." "Be patient."

However, the basic purpose of the summer job is to make personal contact with the workers and union members and "educate" them to the SDS viewpoint.

> "While you can't expect to win over workers in three months, you don't have to wait as long as you might, if it were a permanent job, to 'open up' on political questions."

In these "political discussions," according to the manual, the students are to guide the workers. "Participate in the bull sessions, the lunch discussions, talking on the job where it's normal. . . ." ". . . you're there with a purpose—to bring out the relationship of the Vietnam and the other imperialist wars to their immediate demands, to the fact that they and their sons die in the war, that it is a war for the rich—the CLASS perspective."

> "This is no easy task. It normally takes a lifetime, so don't expect to do it in two or three months!"

The manual urges the young people to join the bowling league or the baseball team. Avoid going directly home after the end of the work shift. "Concentrate on making new friends. Go to the bar or whatever hangout they go to after work."

After the SDS worker is better acquainted with some of the employees, he can deepen his "political" discussions—and by "political" is meant an emphasis on the SDS's viewpoint. "Don't get into knock-down, drag-out arguments . . . but rather talk individually first to the ones you're making friends with."

> "Remember when you start talking about the war (and about how students are seriously opposed to the war for good reasons, not simply engaged in 'beatnik pranks') many workers who feel the same way keep silent while those who support the war are many times the most outspoken."

When you talk about the Vietnam war with fathers whose sons are in Vietnam, be careful! "Start by understanding his position of having been brainwashed all these years and seeing his son in daily danger of 'being killed by the other side.' "

As a final step, concentrate on developing some friends whom you might keep after you quit the summer job and go back to college. Tell these workers that you, as a student, can help them—as picketing or participating in demonstrations. Try to work up a community of interest, to form a type of alliance!

> "Don't necessarily start asking about union meetings. Many times they are suspended in the summer. . . . If, of course, there's something special going on and lots of workers appear headed toward a union meeting, you can go with them, but more to listen and learn than to orate."

These are the plans of the SDS for this summer as many student militants are expected to flood into industrial plants and business establishments.

But the full story has not yet been told—which makes this SDS infiltration and colonization program ever more sinister and dangerous to you, as a union member and patriotic American.

Origins of the manual

This manual from which we have quoted in actuality is what?

It is, in fact, a manual issued some two years ago by the Progressive Labor Party (PLP), the pro-Peking wing of communism in the United States, as a blueprint of instructions for communist infiltration into industry and labor!

PLP elements in the SDS have taken their original Work-in manual, put on a new cover and introduced it as an SDS manual!

This fact illustrates the growing strength of the so-called Old Left, especially the Progressive Labor Party, in the New Left and especially the SDS. This student radicalism and militancy are impregnated with the theories and tactics of Karl Marx.

At the very heart of the SDS Work-In program is an effort by the revolutionary students to forge an alliance with the workers. Why? To create a base for future revolutionary action in this country against our present institutions of free society.

Here lies the true danger of the summer Work-In program of the SDS.

You, as members of the IAM, can be alert to the machinations of these youthful extremists. You will not be fooled by their diabolical double talk, their attempts to paint a distorted picture of this country. You will be able to identify them if they come into your plant. You will be able to counter their false and incorrect arguments. You will let them know that you don't accept their revolutionary concepts.

The International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers has played a valiant role in making America the great country which she is today. By helping defeat this SDS offensive this summer, you, as readers of THE MACHINIST, will be rendering your Nation a great service.

1969 What's Ahead for the U.S. Consumer?

THE CONSUMER'S VOICE

For the past few years the consumer's voice has been raised and heard as never before. And the result has been corrective and beneficial legislation. These measures have won their way through Congress with the strong support--and at times the only organized support--of the trade union movement.

But there's much to be done before the country puts real meaning into the late Pres. John F. Kennedy's bill of rights for consumers. In his 1962 message to Congress, Kennedy spelled out those rights as:

The right to safety--to be protected against the marketing of goods hazardous to health or life.

The right to be informed--to be protected against fraudulent, deceitful or grossly misleading information, advertising, labeling or other practices and to be given the facts needed to make an informed choice.

The right to choose--to be assured, wherever possible, access to a variety of products and services at competitive prices.

The right to be heard--to be assured that the consumer interest will receive full and sympathetic consideration in the formulation of government policy.

Pres. Johnson has implemented with legislative and administrative action the concepts of the Kennedy programs so that the consumer no longer has to take a "back seat." The consumer's voice must continue to be heard.

(Reprinted from the "AFL-CIO News")

How Consumer-Conscious Will The Nixon Administration Be?

Historians who research the Lyndon B. Johnson Administration will find one of its most significant characteristics to have been an increased emphasis on the needs of the consumer. This emphasis began with the 89th Congress and continued through the 90th. Johnson predicted the 90th Congress would be a "Consumer Congress" and its record shows it more than earned the label. Enacted were laws dealing with truth in packaging, auto safety, flammable fabrics, truth in lending, meat and poultry inspection, mail fraud, deceptive land sales, auto liability insurance, and a number of product safety problems.

Now the important question is, what's ahead for the consumer in 1969? How consumer-conscious will the Richard M. Nixon Administration be?

Prior to the Presidential election, Nixon expressed his opinions on consumer protection in a Business Week interview and in a questionnaire from the Consumer Federation of America. He said he would place his emphasis on the "forces of free enterprise" to assure fair play in the marketplace. Conservative economist Milton Friedman, an advisor to Nixon, said "in effect, Nixon will start moving in a new direction and that direction will be toward less authority." In the opinion of some consumer advocates, this laissez-faire attitude at the highest levels of the U.S. Government could set consumer protection back considerably.

AFL-CIO economist Anne Draper predicts a more conservative Congress and an unfriendly Administration could put a "damper" on the future of some key consumer measures still pending. She included in the group the Fish Inspection Act which she feels has the best chance of passage. Other measures include the Deceptive Sales Act which gave the Federal Trade Commission the right to issue certain preliminary injunctions. This passed the Senate but stopped there. In addition, nothing has been done about the entry of banks into the consumer credit field although Congress held brief hearings on bank credit cards. Also the door-to-door sales act died after the Senate Commerce Committee reported it out. This act would have given consumers a grace period to withdraw from contracts with door-to-door salesmen.

Still, it has been reported that Nixon's office has been "flooded" with mail from consumers who want the Administration to maintain a firm policy of regulating business to protect shoppers. Another aspect which may make Nixon take a "second look" at consumer policy is the number of consumer investigations which have recently made headlines.

An example of headlining consumer investigation include Sen. Philip A. Hart's (D-Mich.) Anti-Trust and Monoply Subcommittee hearings on auto repairs. Testimony showed that consumers pay nearly as much each year to repair their cars as they do to buy new ones. In two days of hearings Hart also investigated local credit bureaus. Legislation may be introduced to protect the privacy and credit ratings of consumers.

Senator Gaylord Nelson (D-Wis.) is continuing his hearings on the prescription drug industry and is investigating the possible serious conflicts of interest in the "increasingly close financial relationship between the drug industry and the medical profession."

1969 Consumer Protection "Shopping List"

Hearings by Rep. John Dingle (D-Mich.) have pointed up the abuses of the gasoline games which seem to be a fixture at every filling station. A Federal Trade Commission ruling is predicted. In addition, the 1969 Consumer Assembly will meet in Washington, D.C. on Jan. 30-31 which should result in even more consumer headlines.

As Betty Furness, special assistant to President Johnson for Consumer Affairs, said in a recent speech: "The consumer has a voice now and is using it. No Administration can or should ignore that voice."

On The Legislative Front

Consumer legislation signed by President Johnson in the last months of his administration includes bills to limit the amount of radiation permitted to emanate from various kinds of electronic products, particularly color TV sets, medical and dental X-rays; a bill to broaden the authority of the Postal Inspection Service by making it no longer necessary to prove intent to defraud in cases of suspected mail fraud; and a bill to set aside 58,000 acres of land in California as Redwood National Park.

President Johnson also signed a law imposing increased duties on certain materials, including reprocessed wool, which may result in higher prices for some imported fabrics. Higher textile prices may also result from a recent court order approving a government requirement that imported wool products be tested at the importer's expense to prove they are properly labeled for content.

Consumer champions returned to office in the November elections include:

Senator Warren G. Magnuson, champion of auto safety, truth-in-packaging, product safety and many other consumer causes, won reelection with 65 percent of the vote in the state of Washington, his biggest victory margin in five Senatorial campaigns.

Senator Gaylord Nelson, father of automobile tire safety legislation and overseer of fair prices and safety of prescription drugs, received 62 percent of the Wisconsin vote, the highest percentage captured by a Senator in his state in 40 years.

Representative Leonor K. Sullivan, whose many contributions to the consumer cause include her part in the passage of a strong truth-in-lending act last year, received 75 percent of the vote in her St. Louis Congressional district.

Other consumer champions who were reelected with sizable margins include Senator Abraham A. Ribicoff of Connecticut, Representative Neal Smith of Iowa and Representative Benjamin S. Rosenthal of New York. The consumer can look to all these individuals to continue to fight their cause in 1969.

The Department of Health, Education and Welfare recently established an Office of Consumer Affairs, headed by Dianne McKaig. Seeking solutions to the special needs of the low-income consumer, encouraging consumer education in the public school curriculum, promoting consumer information on nutrition and wise shopping practices, and supporting State and local consumer organizations in their efforts to promote legislation of benefit to the consumer are some of the activities staff members will be working on.

For Your Home and Family

Get organized for 1969 is the suggestion from the January issue of "Changing Times." Here are reminders of nine start-of-the-year activities that can help make the coming months successful ones:

Forecast your cash flow. Compare this year's outlook to last year's results.

Figure your net worth. Every three or six months review the figures. This way you can keep track of your financial progress.

Improve your credit management. Use credit only when you genuinely need to borrow for a worthwhile purpose.

Make a budget.

Review your insurance.

Plan thoughtfully for major purchases.

Invest on a regular schedule.

Prepare now for next year's taxes. Be a "scrap collector." Then when you prepare your return, you'll have good records, which are almost certain to save you tax dollars.

Take that dream vacation. Start a special savings plan by doing without some nonessentials.

Wondering whether or not to take Junior with you to the local neighborhood movie? The recently established Motion Picture Code of Self-Regulation may help you to decide. Under this code, films are classified into four categories:

G-acceptable for general audiences.
M--suggested for mature audiences. (with parental discretion advised).
R--restricted for persons aged 16 or over unless accompanied by a parent or guardian.
X--no one under 16 admitted. (This age restriction may be higher in some areas).

At The Marketplace

Glass-fiber curtains and fabrics for curtains and draperies will have to carry a warning on their label that skin irritation may result from improper handling rules the Federal Trade Commission. Studies show a rash might infect the wearer of clothing in which articles of glass fiber had become embedded after working loose from a glass fabric laundered in the same load as the article of clothing. Even when laundered separately, glass-fiber fabric could leave a residue in the washing machine, contaminating later loads of wash.

Plentiful foods for this time of the year include potatoes, onions, broiler-fryers, dry beans, canned tomatoes and tomato products, oranges, grapefruit, tangerines, canned salmon, and canned grapefruit juice.

For Your Health and Safety

There will be no increase at this time in the $4 monthly premium that persons over 65 pay for physicians' services under Medicare announced Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare Wilbur J. Cohen. Despite pressures within the government to raise the $8 premium, shared equally by the elderly and the government, Cohen said no increase was needed. To up the premium, he emphasized, would further "fan the flames of inflation" throughout Medicare.

Tips on proper usage of auto safety belts: 1. If shoulder belt adjusts separately, keep it slack enough to let your fist fit between the belt and your chest; 2. Never use the shoulder belt alone with nothing to hold you at the hips; 3. A lap belt alone gives the motorist a lot of protection, but he gets much more from a combination of lap and shoulder belts; 4. Keep lap belts snug and low over the hips whether used alone or with a shoulder belt; 5. Don't put the junction of a lap and shoulder belt at the center. It may make the lap belt ride up where it can cause injury.

The Commerce Department is developing standards to protect the public against carpets and rugs that burn easily. This action is the result of Consumers Union Corporation test findings in which both indoor and indoor-outdoor carpets failed to meet Federal purchase specifications. In view of the tests a new flammability standard for carpets and rugs may be needed to protect the public against the risk of fire.

Federal Agency for Consumer Affairs Urged

AFL-CIO Demands More Safeguards Against Frauds, High-Pressure Merchants

SEIU President David Sullivan, commenting on the establishment of a federal agency for consumer affairs, states that "its establishment is an absolute necessity for the protection of the consumer. It is a logical development of the fine consumer legislation passed during recent years — such as auto safety, truth in packaging and lending, meat and poultry inspection and similar measures."

The establishment of an independent federal agency to represent consumers has been urged by the AFL-CIO Executive Council. SEIU President Sullivan participated in the Executive Council meeting in his capacity of AFL-CIO Vice President. "The time has arrived," the Council stated, "when Congress should consider seriously the longstanding proposals to provide unified and permanent consumer representation in the Executive Branch of the government. . . we urge that statutory recognition now be given to the consumer through a Department of Consumer Affairs, an office of Consumer Affairs or other independent agency."

The Council also called on Congress for more protective measures against frauds and high-pressure merchants who prey on the consumer. Unsafe food and drugs, dangerous household chemicals, medical men disguised as merchants and gypsters preying on the poor are just a few of the things the consumer needs more protection from.

The Council also urged Congress to extend the authority of the Federal Trade Commission. In particular, FTC should be authorized to obtain temporary restraining orders from the courts pending the completion of complaint proceedings against law violators.

The prospective study of consumer credit by the new National Commission on Consumer Finance was praised by the Council. However, it urged that Congress proceed promptly to remedy known credit frauds. It called for legislative remedies for the excessive costs of credit life, accident and health insurance, a ban on the distribution of unsolicited credit cards by banks and other financial institutions, and a "cooling off" period in which consumers who buy from high-pressure door-to-door salesmen could change their minds.

Consumer "Agents" Needed To Protect Public Interests

Consumer agents are needed by America's consumers to protect their interests before both federal and state agencies and regulatory commissions. This was the conclusion of participants in the third annual Consumer Assembly held in Washington, D.C. Sponsored by the Consumer Federation of America, the assembly was attended by more than 500 members of the federation representing 148 local, state and national consumer-oriented organizations.

Speakers at the assembly stressed the need for consumer experts to intervene as energetically in the public interest as do the representatives of industry and business. Legislative representative of the Clothing Workers, Esther Peterson suggested that the federation build up a staff of experts, economists, lawyers and social scientists to do this. Mrs. Peterson, who was the first White House special assistant for consumer affairs, pointed out that Congress has not yet provided funds to enforce many of the consumer protection laws now on the statute books.

Advancing the cause of the American consumer must be regarded as a do-it-yourself project to be accomplished now. This is the opinion of Nicholas Johnson, a member of the Federal Trade Commission. Johnson told the delegates he thought a consumer agency should be set up by legislation. But he said that in any event consumers should have their own direct representation, "responsible to you, not to Congress or the White House."

Senator Jacob Javits (R-N.Y.) and Senator Philip Hart (D-Mich.) told the assembly they would introduce bills in this session of Congress to help all consumers. Javits said he would propose a bill to establish a Consumer Protection Assistance Act. The act would provide federal funds to states to cover 50 per cent of the cost of establishing consumer protection programs. Hart said he would sponsor a measure to form an Independent Consumers Council. The council's primary function would be to present the consumer's case whenever government agencies are considering matters relating to his economic interest.

Senator Edmund S. Muskie (D-Me.) appealed to the delegates to become involved in the alleviation of air and water pollution. "The consumer," he said, "has abdicated civic responsibility in these areas on a 'let-George-do-it' basis. The results in terms of men's environment have been devastating and will worsen if something isn't done."

Uniform Credit Code Has "Serious Drawbacks"

Consumers should be aware of "serious drawbacks" in a proposed "model" state law on consumer credit warns the AFL-CIO. The federation's Executive Council says because of these drawbacks it can't endorse the Uniform Credit Code which is expected to be introduced in every state legislature meeting this year.

Major drawbacks, the AFL-CIO states, are the "extraordinarily high" ceilings on installment finance charges and interest rates. The Council said it was "shocked" at the proposal to allow interest rates of 18 to 36 percent.

Other objective features of the proposed code include the "excessive" 10 percent interest rate which would be allowed on first mortgages, and provisions on wage garnishment which could result in lessening of existing protection for wage earners in some states. The AFL-CIO is also alarmed at the proposed general repeal of present state consumer credit legislation "regardless of whether it is superior to code provisions or covers subjects not covered in the code."

Congresswoman Leonor K. Sullivan, (D.-Mo.), principal author of the Consumer Credit Protection Act of 1968, also warns that some of the provisions contained in the code would be a step backward from present strong credit requirements. "What many of us fear--and what all consumers should be deeply concerned about," Mrs. Sullivan says, "is the possibility that the state legislatures--certainly some of them--will use the Truth in Lending portion of the proposed code, which is substantially similar to the Federal Truth in Lending Law, as a stalking horse to open the way to passage of other credit laws which will weaken, not strengthen consumer protections."

On The Legislative Front

The Federal Trade Commission has adopted the following regulation concerning ads and catalogs using the word "sale": "Items not reduced are clearly set off and identified, and the 'sale' or reduction representation is clearly qualified by a statement which indicates all items offered are not reduced."

Consumer affairs regulations designed to eliminate credit abuses affecting the poor in Washington, D.C. are now in effect. The new D.C. Credit Licensing Act requires the licensing of all finance companies and merchants offering credit, plus full disclosure of the cost of goods and credit. The act prohibits such abuses as "small-print" contracts, and misleading advertising of credit terms.

Great Britain has placed into operation an extensive consumer protection law--the Trade Descriptions Act.

Under the new law, traders or manufacturers who give false information about their goods, prices or services are now liable to unlimited fines and prison sentences up to two years.

Despite more forthright labeling under the two-year-old Federal Fair Packaging and Labeling Act, housewives still can't compare prices in the supermarket, says Consumers Union, the nation's largest consumer advisory organization. Hence, it is recommending an amendment to the law, which would require stores to put unit prices on every package, along with the package price. Unit price is the price per pound, pint or other standard unit of consumption. It is already used for the pricing of meat and poultry at most supermarkets.

More than two dozen House members, led by Congressman James G. O'Hara (D.-Mich.) have joined in sponsoring bills establishing a national Occupational Health and Safety program for industry. Citing the fact that 14,500 workers are killed annually in work accidents, Rep. O'Hara describes the proposed legislation as "tough and wide-ranging."

While the latest of the so-called washday miracles--laundry products supercharged with enzymes--really can get rid of stubborn stains, the housewife may be able to achieve the same result at half the cost. To see if the results with the enzymes matched the claims, a consumers' organization tested two highly-promoted enzyme products, and as a control, a leading detergent without enzymes. The conclusion: The presoak with the detergent did as good a job on most of the stains as did the two enzyme presoaks.

Warranties and guarantees are two words that mean the same: almost nothing. This is the conclusion of a 217-page Task Force report on appliance warranties prepared by the Federal Trade Commission. The FTC points out that merely the placing of a product on the market carries with it an implied warranty that the product is safe and reasonably fit for the purpose for which it is sold. Fancy wording of warranties designed to get around this obligation has been meeting increasing opposition in the courts.

In other words, if a product turns out to be unsafe, does not perform the ways the ads say it will, or contains manufacturing defects; the seller has a firm obligation to make adjustments or refunds regardless of the wording of the warranty. If he refused, the buyer has a good chance of collecting damages through the courts.

At The Marketplace

Food prices will continue to fluctuate this year according to U.S. Department of Agriculture economists. Retail prices for many fruits and processed vegetables are expected to average below 1968 levels. Potato prices, however, are likely to be above the '68 levels. Beef retail prices will probably be stable and pork prices lower. In the sweet tooth department--prices for candy, confectionary and soft drinks will likely continue to rise.

Plentiful foods for this time of the year include turkeys, dry beans, rice, peanuts and peanut products, canned and frozen corn, onions, canned and frozen green beans, and prunes. Be sure to include them on your weekly grocery list.

How do you shop for the weekly groceries? A Michigan survey found that nearly a fourth of the homemakers questioned shop by trial and error. Women perform this way nowadays not because they are lazy but because shopping has become more difficult. In fact, a supermarket may contain as many as 8,000 items, and many foods come prepackaged with inadequate information on their contents.

If you are "guilty" of using the trial and error method, here are some of the myths about food values:

Canned Produce: Main difference between fruits in "heavy" syrup and the cheaper "light" syrup is less than an ounce of sugar which is worth less than one cent. The nutritional value is exactly the same.

Eggs: Grade A or AA eggs are the same in nutritional value as Grade B or other cheaper eggs.

Meat: The expensive "Choice" grade does not have as much lean as the cheaper "Good" and "Standard" grades. Thus, it does not have as much protein, and is less nutritious.

The New Milk: While the new "2% milk" does have less milkfat than standard whole milk (usually 3 1/2%), many brands contain 2% added solids. Thus, the "2% milk" really has more protein, calcium and other minerals than the higher-fat standard kind.

For Your Health and Safety

Modern drugs are complex chemicals and some are adversely affected by age. If left on your medicine shelf too long, they could change enough to poison a person, even damage certain vital organs. You should always dispose of the following: any medicine that has changed color or formed a residue at the bottom of the bottle; aspirin tablets that are crumbly or that give off a vinegary odor; hydrogen peroxide that no longer bubbles when applied; milk of magnesia that has become caked; ointments that have separated, developed spots or become discolored; nose drops that have become cloudy or have developed a sediment; and eyewash left over from treating any eye disorder.

Will your family get out alive if your home is struck by fire? To make sure that they do, you should map out an escape route and have practice fire drills. An alternate route, usually a window, for each room of the house should also be planned. Danger areas such as stairways, halls, clothes chutes, or elevator shafts where air, and consequently fire, can flow freely should be pointed out. You should also decide on who should help small children, old people, or invalids in case of crisis. It should be emphasized that the whole family should be out of the house before taking time to call the fire department. A meeting place should be decided on so no one will return to rescue one who is already safe.

HOW TO SAVE $$$$ ON YOUR VACATION TRIP THIS SUMMER

Whether your vacation plans for this summer are for the city, seashore, or perhaps camping in the national parks and forests, there are many ways you can make it less expensive. And, as you will find, trimming costs need not mean cutting down on pleasure.

A wise first move is to select one place with enough appeal that you would enjoy staying there several days. This way you will usually be rewarded with better rates on accommodations and a reduction in transportation expenses. Comparison shopping among travel possibilities is also a must. Make inquiries and thumb through brochures until you feel sure you are making the best use of your financial outlay.

You may wish to consult a travel agent in planning your vacation. He can tailor it to your budget by recommending hotels and trips that he knows are worth the money either from his own experience or clients' reports. An agent usually will not charge you for his services when making reservations for a bus tour, airline-hotel package plan, a week's stay at a resort and other quickly arranged trips, as he receives a commission in these cases. However, he may charge for scheduling, confirming a complex itinerary and other services. Thus, it is wise to inquire about fees at the start of a consultation.

How to Save $$$ on Air, Railroad and Car Travel...

When traveling by airplane, ask about the Family Plan. Generally speaking, it specifies: full-fare for Father; two-thirds for Mother; one-third for children aged two to 21; and a free ride for children under two. You can also save money by taking "excursion" flights which specify certain days and hours that you may fly. Another substantial saving is offered to the young passenger aged 12 to 22 who holds a $3 "youth" card and waits at the airport as a stand-by until a vacancy occurs on the desired flight.

Railroads also offer Family Plans. For example, under Union Pacific's Family Plan, the head of the family pays regular fare; wife and/or children 12 to 21 years, two-thirds of the fare; children five through eleven, one-third. Many railroads provide "Dining Club Meal Books" which enable passengers to save money on breakfast, lunch and dinner. A similar book, specifying children's portions, is available in many cases for youngsters.

There are many ways to save money if you are planning to travel by car this summer. One is to take advantage of hotel and motel Family Plans, another is to stay in a minimum or standard-size accommodation rather than one that is wastefully big and expensive. If you are staying in a hotel or motel that belongs to a chain, the desk will make the next reservation for you without charge.

When traveling by car you can save money on food by fixing your own breakfast with sweetrolls and instant coffee, picnic lunches, and asking for children's menu and children's portions in restaurants.

Costly tolls may be eliminated and the boredom of thruway travel broken if you occasionally shift your driving to parallel local roads. Drive at reasonable speeds and abstain from sudden stops and starts to get good mileage per gallon and prevent excessive wear on tires. In addition, have your car checked ahead of time to avoid repairs on the road that may prove expensive.

Save $$$ With City Vacations...

Cities are ideal for long weekend vacations. These "mini-vacations" require little advance planning, itinerary charting or room reservations. In addition, weekends often mean bargains; hotels in some cities promote weekend packages, and car rental firms offer special rates valid from 5 P.M. Friday to 9 A.M. Monday..

Some airlines offer package tours to various cities such as New York, which include visits to nightclub spots, sight-seeing tours, hotel accommodations, and theater tickets. Chicago has recently initiated a promotion with a reduction in rates at a number of popular hotels, for example The Drake on Lake Shore Drive overlooking Lake Michigan. Some of the hotels add extras, such as sight-seeing boat or bus tours, to the package. For detailed information write the Tourism Council of Greater Chicago, The Civic Center, Chicago, Illinois 60602. Of course, cities are also ideal for longer vacations because of museums, parks and other recreation areas which have little or no admission fees. If you are interested in a particular city, you can obtain accommodation and sightseeing information by writing to its Chamber of Commerce.

Save $$$ by Camping in National Parks and Forests...

If your plans for the summer include a back-to-nature vacation in the National Parks (supervised by the Department of the Interior) or the National Forests (run by the Department of Agriculture), you can save money on admission fees by purchasing a Golden Eagle Passport costing $7 and valid for a year. It admits the holder and occupants of his car to all Federal Recreation areas which require auto entrance fees. The permit can be bought at all Federal Recreation areas and at offices of Federal agencies that manage public recreation areas.

Inexpensive pamphlets containing detailed information about the National Parks, National Forests and Federal Monuments may be obtained by writing to the Superintendent of Documents Government Printing Office, Washington,D.C. 20402. Three particularly informative publications are:

.National Forest Vacations. A 66-page booklet, illustrated, 30 cents. Catalog No. A 13.2 V 13/4/960.

.Camping in the National Park System. A 22-page booklet, illustrated, 15 cents. Catalog No. I 29-71: 966

.National Parks and Landmarks. A 46-page booklet, 35 cents. Catalog No. I 29.66: 966.

.National Parks of the United States. Packet of eight maps covering the National Park System by regions, including the parks of New York City, Washington, D.C. and one large map of the U.S. locating all parks and interstate highway systems; chart lists facilities, accommodations and activities.

Excellent for vacations, $1.50 (per set). Catalog No. I 29.6: P23

Other Ways to Save $$$ This Summer...

.Spend a few weeks at a ranch or farm, an economical way of enjoying country life in an informal setting. You can find a suitable farm or ranch from newspaper advertisements or by writing to the Chamber of Commerce in a particular location.

.Try a temporary "home-swap"--perhaps with a relative who lives in the city if you live in a rural community or vice versa.

.Take an off-season cruise, usually in late spring and from the end of August to a week before Christmas. During these periods there is often a 10% cut in the regular fare and a special "Family Plan" for children. An off-season tropical holiday is also a big money saver since summer hotel rates drop between 30% and 40% from the winter peak season rates. During the off-season, beaches are less crowded and the weather reliably sunny with virtually no rain. There is also less variation among summer and winter temperatures than you might assume. For instance, in Nassau, Bahamas the average January temperature is 72 and the average July temperature 82. Many hotels, airlines and travel agencies offer package plans during the off-season.

.Spend this summer in Canada, which has much to offer as a vacationland. If you live on the Atlantic seaboard it is an easy trip to either the Canadian Maritime Provinces or French-speaking Quebec. Midwesterners are not all that far from fishing, hunting, and camping in northwestern Ontario. If you are planning a city vacation, consider visiting Toronto, Montreal, Quebec City, Vancouver or Ottawa, Canada's picturesque capital.

A final tip--spend the last vacation day or two at home so that you can rest and be ready to return to your job refreshed instead of worn-out.

On The Legislative Front

Effective July 1, the new Truth in Lending law will apply to all creditors. Clear disclosure of the terms and conditions surrounding the granting or arranging of credit to consumer borrowers is required under the law. In advertising, if any one term of credit is disclosed then other terms must be disclosed such as the monthly payment and interest rate. Hopefully, this new law will encourage consumers to be wise users of, and careful shoppers for credit.

Mrs. Virginia Knauer has been appointed by President Nixon as the new White House consumer adviser. For 14 months, Mrs. Knauer headed the Pennsylvania Bureau of Consumer Protection in the state attorney general's office. In her new position, she will undertake a government-wide survey of consumer programs.

For Your Home and Family

If you are one of the many outdoor adventurers who plan to make their own camps away from developed facilities during this summer's vacation, you should observe a few rules for off-the road travel.

.Keep your vehicle on the road unless the ground is firm enough to allow off-road travel without leaving ruts; careless driving can cause soil erosion.

.Leave fences and gates as you find them.

.In range country, camp at least one quarter of a mile from watering places; don't frighten livestock.

.Be careful about fire. Build campfires only in safe places where flames can't spread. Make sure your fire is completely dead when you leave.

.Keep a clean camp; leave a clean camp.

.Be careful with firearms.

.Be a courteous driver. Watch out for people and wildlife on the road. Walk on left, facing traffic.

.Be prepared. When you head into back country, leave word where you're going. Take plenty of water, a good map, compass, first aid kit, spare rations, and extra clothing. Respect public and private property. Treat the land as you would your own.

Before you lock the front door and take off for this summer's vacation be sure and stop all deliveries--things piled up on the porch may invite trouble-makers. The police department should be notified so routine checks can be made of your property. In addition, be sure to turn off utilities, check water heater, and turn off gas supply if not needed. Lock all doors and windows, and leave a key with your neighbor so that entry can be made in an emergency.

Milk and dairy products head the list of plentiful foods for June. Other items in good supply at your neighborhood grocery store include canned and frozen sweet corn, canned tomatoes and tomato products, rice and turkeys.

For Your Health and Safety

Summertime is outdoor living time and as eating, swimming, playing, and even dancing and singing have moved outside, so has electricity. Unfortunately, with the use of outside power there are more hazards than with use of electricity indoors. Follow these tips from the National Safety Council to make sure summertime doesn't turn into danger time for you:

1. The biggest danger is the possibility of electrical shock due to accidental grounding. With moist earth all about, a faulty tool or appliance can send a surge of lethal current through a person by way of the ground. All electrical equipment should be in good repair.

2. Another common outdoor danger is the use of extension cords and connections that overload circuits. Be sure that extension cords are in good condition. Keep all cords out of water. Don't overload extension cords with high wattage and appliances.

3. Don't neglect barbecue motors or tools by leaving them out in bad weather or stored in damp places. Very frequently barbecue motors have no grounding wires and no plug. Have a qualified electrician provide a suitable grounding for yours.

4. Be careful not to cut the cord when using an electric mower. Don't splice cut cords--replace them. Power mower cords should be a bright color to make them visible against grass. Using an electric saw outdoors? Have the saw properly grounded especially when working from a metal ladder. Keep extension cords out of the driveway.

VOL. XXIV Union: IAM WASHING

Watkins, Veep Dean, Leads 'New South'

IAM Vice President George Watkins of Dallas, Tex., now oversees this union's activities in eight states which he has named "the New Southern Territory."

The territory embraces Texas, Florida, Georgia, Alabama, Louisiana, Mississippi, Arkansas and Oklahoma. All but Louisiana and Arkansas are "right-to-work" states.

"That's why we are forever trying to catch up with the rest of the country," he told THE MACHINIST recently. "Our problem in the New South is not regional prejudice against labor organization," he explained, "it's an intransigent northern ownership that milks southern industry and hustles the profits north."

Watkins concluded long ago that labor's problems in the New South are largely political and must be solved by more effective organization at the polling places. That the effort is worthwhile, he has no doubt.

He cites Sen. Ralph Yarborough of Texas, chairman of the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare(see below), as evidence that a sincere southern liberal can be an asset to the entire nation.

Watkins brings to his assignment in the New South a wealth of experience. He is the dean of the IAM Executive Council, having served in that office since 1959.

Watkins

Like so many modern-day southerners, Watkins came from the north. He was born on Feb. 11, 1910, at Agency, Iowa. He attended school in Ottumwa and Agency, Iowa, and had two quarters at Iowa State College before he went to work. In Ottumwa he married Helen Bender in 1932.

Watkins served his apprenticeship at the Dain Mfg. Co., Ottumwa, worked in several plants in Iowa as a production worker, a journeyman machinist and a toolmaker.

He joined IAM Local 81 in 1935, later serving as its president. During the formative period of District 102, he served as its provisional president. In

1946 he was elected District Business Representative and soon became a vice president of the Iowa State Council of Machinists. He resigned those offices in 1950 to accept appointment as an IAM Grand Lodge Representative.

As a Grand Lodge Representative, Watkins served a stint as Airline Coordinator at headquarters, supervised the reorganization of IAM District 720, Torrance, Calif., led organizing campaigns, participated in negotiations and arbitration hearings, handled jurisdictional matters for the then IAM President Al Hayes. He also appeared before Government boards and agencies on behalf of the IAM.

In 1959, he was elected a General Vice President. He was reelected in 1961, 1965 and 1969.

As Vice President, Watkins served as Resident Vice President at headquarters until 1964, when he was assigned to lead the old Southern Territory with headquarters in Atlanta, Ga.

After that territory was abolished in 1965, Watkins handled special assignments for IAM Past President Roy Siemiller including a period working with IAM Local 712, Montreal, Que., and with Local 687 at the Philadelphia Navy Yard.

Watkins' background as a journeyman earned him an appointment to the Federal Committee on Apprenticeship on which he has served since 19633. His work on that committee has taken him to Sweden and to Germany for studies of their apprentice training methods.

Watkins is also a member of the Labor Committee of the National Planning Association, and a member of the National Defense Executive Reserve.

His hobbies are skydiving—he has a "B" license—and bobsledding—he is licensed for the half mile and the mile runs at Lake Placid, N.Y. He also is a veteran scuba diver.

Watkins is a member of the Episcopal church.

North Carolina Elects New State Officers

Raleigh, N. C.—The North Carolina AFL-CIO elected a new president at its 12th annual convention and amended the constitution to reinstitute the office of secretary-treasurer, eliminated seven years ago.

At the final convention session in Wrightsville Beach, Wilbur Hobby was installed as president and James Hart of the Communications Workers, Burlington, as secretary-treasureer and state COPE chairman.

Hobby had resigned his post as COPE area director late in August to run against W. M. Barbee, state federation president and secretary-treasurer. Hart was elected to the state COPE chairmanship to succeed Bob Brown.

Hobby is a former president of the Durham AFL-CIO and former editor of the Durham Labor News. He is a member of the Newspaper Guild and the Tobacco Workers.

March Against CP&L

But Firm's Plans Are Unchanged

9-13-69

By RICHARD DAW
Associated Press Writer

RALEIGH — Several thousand union members, chanting "We want jobs," marched in Raleigh Friday to protest the hiring of an out-of-state firm for a $469 million electric power construction project.

The protest, aimed at Carolina Power and Light Co., disrupted traffic on Fayetteville Street, the city's main thoroughfare, for almost two hours.

It brought no changes in CP&L's plans to have the Brown and Root Construction Co. of Houston, Tex., build generating plants for it at Asheville, Roxboro, Lumberton, Wilmington and Southport.

A spokesman said no North Carolina firms submitted bids on the projects.

Union leaflets calling Brown and Root "a viciously anti-union" firm were passed out and a resolution was presented to Gov. Bob Scott's office, asking him to intervene.

The resolution said "We believe the workers will be brought to North Carolina to take jobs that rightfully belong to our people."

It asked Scott "to use your influence with Carolina Power and Light Co. to head off this economic loss to our workers, our merchants and our state."

Scott was not at the Capitol when the marchers, striding 20 abreast in a line that stretched almost four blocks, circled the building chanting, "Where's Bob Scott?

He was attending a meeting of the executive committee of the board of trustees of the Consolidated University of North Carolina of which he is chairman.

Wilbur Hobby, president of the North Carolina AFL-CIO which organized the march, and other union officials met with representatives of CP&L during the demonstration.

Hobby said CP&L had rejected a list of union proposals, including one that the construction company favor.

Albert Morris, CP&L director of public relations, said he had no specific comment on the proposals of the union leaders but that most workers already on the job were North Carolinians.

He said that at Asheville, the only one of the five projects on which more than a few workmen are employed at this stage, 98 of the 100 craftsmen were hired locally.

Morris said Brown and Root "is employing and will continue to employ qualified local craftsmen" whether or not they are union members.

New President Flexes Union's Muscle

CO 9/14/69

An Observer Analysis

By RICHARD DAW
Associated Press

RALEIGH — The new president of the N.C. AFL - CIO is losing no time in setting a militant style for the labor organization.

The official, Wilbur Hobby of Durham, gave a demonstration of things to come with a march Friday by thousands of union members in downtown Raleigh.

It was the largest gathering of union members in the memory of Raleigh old-timers, and a sharp departure from traditional union tactics.

The theme of the march was a protest against Carolina Power and Light Company's awarding of a $469 million construction contract to a Texas firm which the AFL-CIO leadership consider, "viciously anti-union."

But Hobby left no doubt that the march was a demonstration of union strength, too.

"From now on, we're going to go first class," Hobby told his cheering listeners.

Statistically, the union movement in North Carolina appears extremely weak, with only an estimated 90,000 members out of a total labor force of about 2.3 million.

Hobby's task will be to make the weight of those few felt out of proportion while trying to swell the number.

His success in organizing Friday's march shows he's off to a good start.

The 43-year-old Durham tobacco worker gained his new leadership post last week after a dozen years of trying for it.

The theme he used in unseating the veteran Millard Barbee was the old political slogan, "it's time for a change."

But Hobby seems to be taking the slogan at face value.

A unionist who knows both Hobby and Barbee well puts it this way: "Barbee goes for the short gainer — Hobby will throw the long ball. Barbee will settle for an occasional drink of water — Hobby wants the whole bucket."

Friday's march brought no concessions from CP&L.

The union charged that the Brown and Root Construction Co., chosen by CP&L to construct five generating plants in North Carolina, "has a reputation of anti-union activity."

The demonstrators, in a resolution presented to Gov. Bob Scott's office, asked Scott "to use your good offices and influence with Carolina Power and Light Company to head off" the economic loss they claim will result from bringing in workers from outside the state.

Scott was not at the capitol when the marchers, striding 20 abreast in a line that stretched almost four blocks, circled the building chanting, "Where's Bob Scott?"

The governor was attending a meeting of the executive committee of the board of trustees of the Consolidated University of North Carolina. He is chairman of the board.

Trying to bring the governor into the picture was in keeping with Hobby's drive to make unionism more of a political force in North Carolina.

Local Co Jobs Not Shut Down

Charlotte building trades unions affiliated with the AFL-CIO sent seven busloads "and a lot of cars" full of union members, to Raleigh Friday to participate in a march protesting a large building contract that went to an out-of-state firm, a union spokesman said.

The workers joined several thousands others from across the state in a march around the State Capitol to protest a $500,000 contract awarded by Carolina Light and Power Co. to Brown and Root Construction Co. of Houston, Texas. The unions claim the Texas firm is anti-union and will discriminate against union men in hiring.

Despite the number of Charlotteans participating, local contractors reported few projects, closed down for the day. Many builders, here have few, if any, union employes in construction.

Work was halted on the Jeffersop-First Union Tower on College Street, and slowed on some other large jobs, because of the "holiday" declared by the unions, but home building went on as usual, employers said.

One contractor explained, "None of ours went, Friday is payday."

Country Club Dinner Picketed In Wilmington

RAL 9-7-69

WILMINGTON — Union members picketed the Cape Fear Country Club Friday night where Brown and Root Construction Co., of Houston, Tex. was holding a "get acquainted" dinner for local leaders.

Brown and Root is in Wilmington to build two large projects for Carolina Power and Light Co. One is a $48 million addition to the Louis V. Sutton Plant at Mount Misery near Wilmington, and the other is a $300 million nuclear generating plant near Southport.

The pickets showed placards reading "CP&L unfair to organized labor."

Foster Parker, senior group vice president of Brown and Root, said most of the work force for the projects will be hired locally. He said Brown and Root position as an "open shop" organization which allows the company to hire laborers directly and not through a third party.

Parker said the company has no plans to change its open shop policy in Wilmington.

At a rally attended by 1,200 union members last Sunday, half a dozen labor speakers said Carolina Power and Light Company's action in hiring Brown and Root was part of what was called "a conspiracy to destroy the building trades unions in North and South Carolina."

INTERNATIONAL PRINTING PRESSMEN & ASSISTANTS' UNION of NORTH AMERICA

VOL. 2, NO. 1, JANUARY 1970

Announcing New Technical Section

The Board of Directors voted to discontinue printing of AMERICAN PRESSMAN REPORTS as of January 1, 1970 and to supplant it with inserts of two to four pages quarterly in NEWS & VIEWS, our official journal. In NEWS & VIEWS this section of two to four pages will be titled TECHNICAL REPORTS and will carry the latest information that can be gathered on technical changes, processes and methods in our industry. It is believed that these technical articles will be read not only by our craft members but also by our specialty members who work on presses of all types and also in offset preparatory departments who formerly were not recipients of AMERICAN PRESSMAN REPORTS.

The 1968 Convention voted to have one official journal and the Board reasons that NEWS & VIEWS, as our official journal, should have included in it the technical report section, formerly carried in AMERICAN PRESSMAN REPORTS.

Due to this change, which will be beneficial to all of our members, our International Union will save approximately $40,000 per year.

Dear Mr. Via:

Thank you for your letter of February 9, in which you accept our invitation to be a discussion leader at our April seminar. You come highly recommended and I am looking forward to meeting you and seeing you in action at our seminar.

I am enclosing a copy of our January issue of News and Views which contains an article on our District Council programs and some of the problems Councils are having. This article is in the center spread.

So far we have not made any written appeal for local union merger but we are hoping that we can supply supporting information such as the enclosed breakdown on membership and maps showing where our locals are located. The enclosed material will show you the locals and their total number of members in the southeast area. As you can see, we are spread very thin in some states, with our greatest strength in the Atlanta area. The point that we will be trying to make is that there are some natural areas for merger, particularly when they are in the same metropolitan area. Since our goal is to establish effective local unions, we equate this with a sufficient number of members to support a fulltime operation. This material may give you a better idea of what we are talking about.

One other suggestion. In some of the seminars the discussion leaders have divided the subject matter and will run one session on the same subject to two different groupings. You may wish to follow that procedure with Al Kehrer.

Please feel free to phone me collect if you have any further questions or suggestions.

Sincerely,

Walter M. Allen

1970 IPP&AU SEMINARS

BUILDING EFFECTIVE LOCAL UNIONS

Background for Seminars:

The 1970 series of area seminars marks the beginning of an education and information program which was approved by the 1968 Convention.

These seminars are in answer to the need of local union leaders to learn ways and means of improving their locals and, also, a mechanism for International Union officers and staff to learn more about the day-to-day problems of the local unions.

From the beginning we have had the aid and support of the various Councils and Conferences in selecting the right time and place for the seminars, as well as priorities for the program subjects.

We have also had the very important help of experienced labor educators from the Education Department of the AFL-CIO and the Canadian Labour Congress, and from various State Universities. Without their help, we would not have had the assistance of professional educators which we have brought to each seminar.

The original subject title of the seminars was "Building Better Local Unions". We have modified this title to "Building Effective Local Unions" because we believe we cannot afford to settle for just better locals. We want the best and most effective unions we can have.

In this opening seminar it will be our purpose to determine what the aims of a union are, or should be, and what is needed to obtain and operate an effective local union.

We will examine what is meant by:

1. Competent leadership
2. An active membership
3. A vigorous organizing program
4. Successful collective bargaining
5. Adequate financing
6. Recognition of union structure
7. Need for active affiliations

We will be covering a lot of ground in a brief period of time. Of necessity the discussion leaders will be trying to move along through each of these important subjects.

We will be avoiding lectures or speeches, but we want everyone to feel free to express his opinions and to share his experiences and problems.

Although you will hear a lot of talk and opinions at this seminar, we hope that we will be able to reach agreement on some actions which should be tried in order to gain effective local unions for our members. Talk without plans for action will mean that we have failed in the full purpose of this seminar.

We will be working hard, but we will provide coffee breaks and time out to eat. We think you will enjoy every minute and, when the seminar is over, will be anxious to try out what you have learned as quickly as possible.

The Discussion Leaders today are:

Public Empl. Union

Public Employees

Union organizing in private industry is moribund. Present membership (20 million) represents only 28 percent of the working force, down from a 1955 high of 33.2 percent. By contrast the campaign to organize 13.5 million government workers around the country is moving along briskly under the leadership of the Coalition of American Public Employees, consisting of the 1.2 million-member National Education Association, the AFL-CIO's 600,000-member American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees (AFSCME) and the International Association of Fire Fighters (IAFF), also part of AFL-CIO, with 110,000 members. The coalition is preparing to lobby for federal guidelines for collective bargaining by government workers, their right to strike, repeal of the Hatch Act and similar state laws prohibiting political campaigning, repeal of government pension fund regulations that allow a government worker's retirement income to be taxed twice, and "adequate financing" of government operations and services.

The coalition is the brainchild of Jerry Wurf, president of AFSCME, who in 1970 asked for and was given the authority by his union to affiliate with other public employee unions. Letters were sent out and a warm reply received from the NEA, which represents almost four-fifths of the nation's school teachers. Negotiations between the NEA and AFSCME led to formation of the coalition in March 1971. A few months later the administration gave it a boost by imposing a wage freeze. Because many teachers are on a September to August fiscal year, the freeze was particularly painful where new contracts were about to go into effect.

AFSCME membership has grown 150 percent since 1960 and continues to grow at the rate of 1,000 per week. The union has organized about one-third of the nonmanagerial government workers in the country, doing it without benefit of the National Labor Relations Act, which formally recognizes and sets guidelines for organizing in private industry. If the coalition wins an equivalent law for its members or can bring them in under the NLRB, it will be open season on government workers, and every union in the country will try to organize them. The Teamsters are already going after such groups as the police.

The National Education Association brings a set of unresolved issues to the coalition, however. For the past 10 years the NEA has been fighting with the American Federation of Teachers (275,000 members) for exclusive representation of 2.1 million teachers. In the early '60s the conflict was muted because the NEA was a sleepy "professional" organization which shunned trade unionism's traditional rhetoric and tactics, and the AFT was an equally powerless and much smaller union trying to recover from years of "Red" smears. Then Albert Shanker, a Queens mathematics teacher, and David Selden, the current president of the AFT, won the right for the union to represent New York City's 45,000 teachers, and in succeeding years the AFT won representation rights in other cities and larger and larger wage increases. The AFT is not interested in the coalition, charging that it is an attempt by the NEA to secure the benefits of the AFL-CIO without paying dues.

The situation is further complicated by the fact that the two principal organizers of the AFT, Selden and Shanker, are engaged in an open struggle for control. A few weeks ago Shanker, a union vice-president as well as co-director of the merged New York state teachers groups, won enough votes on the union's executive council to be nominated to fill the first available vacancy on the executive committee of the AFL-CIO. Selden has lashed out publicly against his old friend, accusing him of being a "Meany-man." A unified national teachers' organization would add greatly to the power of the Coalition of Public Employees; a bitterly divided AFT plus continuation of the AFT-NEA dispute could seriously damage it.

INTERNATIONAL PRINTING PRESSMEN & ASSISTANTS' UNION of NORTH AMERICA

SOLVING THE SEVENTIES

Theme of 1970 Seminars

Setting Our Sights

by Anthony J. DeAndrade, International President

What lies ahead in the 70s?

Will we still be making major changes in the way our Union operates, and in the way we tackle our problems, as we did in the 1960s?

Or can we expect relative calm and quiet in the 1970s?

Will the rapidly changing technology in the printing and allied industries, which we experienced in the 1960s level off in the 70s?

Or will it be accelerated?

How will we adjust to these changes?

Are we prepared,

Will our union members, in the 1970s, recognize that each worker and his family is directly affected by political decisions made at every level of government?

Will each of us become more politically conscious and active?

Will each union member make certain that he is properly registered, fully informed on the issues and the candidates, and using his vote at every opportunity?

As union members will we know about and support the AFL-CIO's political and legislative programs?

What kind of a job has your local union been doing?

Is your local properly financed, properly organized to do an effective job of bargaining for maximum wages and working conditions?

Are union members adequately informed about the role and goals of his union?

Is each member shouldering his responsibility in the program of his union?

Is your local affiliated with and active in a District Council or District Joint Council?

Is your local union attracting new members?

Hidden behind these many questions are the problems and promises which lie ahead. Individually, we cannot hope to answer very many of these questions or solve many problems. Collectively, however, there is little limit to what we can accomplish.

Active union members can invigorate a previously dormant and ineffective local union. Local unions joining with other locals can support and operate effective councils which can improve the conditions in a whole area. The International Union can lead multi-plant and multi-area bargaining programs which will achieve otherwise-impossible gains for all participants.

It is within this framework that the International Union is launching a series of educational seminars in 1970.

The theme of the seminars, "Solving the Seventies", assumes that union members, local, area, and international union leaders are aware of the union's problems and are confident that an educational approach will evolve solutions and programs to meet and overcome these problems.

In sponsoring these seminars (which will be described in detail elsewhere), the Board of Directors believes that the seminar approach is the best and most democratic way for the Union to take a great stride forward into the new decade. All locals are urged to prepare to send delegates to their area's seminar. Delegates should go prepared to exchange information and ideas and, hopefully, return to their locals proposing new approaches and programs for the benefit of all members.

These seminars offer us a great opportunity to begin the 1970s with a new burst of energy, with well-prescribed goals and a certainty of major progress.

For many weeks plans have been underway for a series of educational seminars in 1970. These are to be sponsored by the International Union with the cooperation and aid of various Conferences and District Joint Councils, and administered by the Union's Department of Education and Information.

Preliminary suggestions on the general intent and location of the seminars were approved by the Board of Directors in mid-September. Later, in October, the Committee on Education and Information made a number of suggestions on program content, dates, etc. The Director of the Department, Walter Allen, has been visiting a number of District Joint Council meetings to obtain suggestions of time and place and programs for each area.

Area and national Conferences, too, have also been contacted with the possibility that some may wish to schedule a seminar in conjunction with annual meetings.

Exact dates and places have not yet been determined, except in a few instances. Many others will be firmly scheduled, however, within the next few weeks. Dates and locations of area seminars will be announced in the News and Views as soon as plans are completed.

A point of view

A plan for all seasons

by Anthony J. De Andrade

Christmas time and the New Year causes us to reflect upon the past and ponder on the future. It is customary for the head of the household to evaluate the family's position "what has been gained in the past year" and "what shall we strive for in the coming year"? This is no less true for the head of an International organization because he too feels this same responsibility. As President of the International Printing Pressmen, I see many accomplishments and gains that have accrued to the membership in the past year.

We are well established in our International Headquarters in Washington, D.C. This has greatly expedited the overall operations of the officers, representatives and affiliated local unions.

News and Views has created enormous interest and involvement among the members, many letters of commendation have been received.

The new Education and Information Dept. is now operational and is moving toward establishing a series of seminars in the new year.

The Scholarship Fund could easily be considered the International Unions number one project for the year of 1969. Walter Allen, Director of the Education and Information Dept. informs me that he is ready to start the 1970 scholarship award program in January.

The Los Angeles Her-Ex lockout has caused much concern, it is incumbent upon each member of the union to support our brothers in this strike. The International Board of Directors approved continuing the payment of the strikers Health and Welfare program when Her-Ex refused to make any further contributions.

Looking forward into the new year, I would like to call attention to several areas. The Citizens' Job Protection laws or ordinances, more commonly known as anti-strikebreakers laws, need to be expanded. In a New Jersey strike some of the nations most notorious scabs found themselves caught in a crossfire between New Jersey's state law and a city ordinance. They panicked and left town.

The campaign for tax justice is sagging badly in the Senate. Mail to members of the Congress for genuine reform of the federal tax structure has dropped off sharply. At the same time, the Administration has proposed to undermine even the House-passed bill—a first-step that requires strengthening in the Senate, rather than gutting. And droves of lobbyists for the various loop-hole groups—oil, brokerage and investment houses, big cattle breeders and others—are working hard to destroy any remnant of genuine tax reform. Any hope for achieving a measure of tax justice from the Congress in the coming weeks requires an immediate revival of mail to members of the Congress, particularly to members of the Senate, where the tax issue is now.

The Senate Judiciary Committee voted 8-to-4 to allow competing newspapers to pool profits and operate joint printing, circulation and advertising facilities and rate structures. Greater vigilance must be exercised in this area by all of the printing trades unions.

The AFL-CIO has called up every union member in America to contribute $1 toward the support of General Electric strikers and started this national fund-raising drive with a donation of $50,000. This effort should be heartily supported by every member of the International Printing Pressmen's Union.

Since 1964, the cost of being sick has soared three times as much as the cost of living, a hospital room costs from $60 to $85 a day. Doctor bills are up 20%. And next year, experts predict, health care will cost 15% more—and the next—and the next—who can afford to be sick? Something must be done about Americans spending more for medical care and getting less for their money than any other people in the world.

Reflect on the past, work in the present, and plan for the future is a sound plan for all seasons. We heartily subscribe to such a program and advocate the same for our membership.

In this great and turbulent year of 1969, we send the warmest of Season's greetings to our members (active or retired), their families and loved ones everywhere confident in the belief that our thoughts represent those of each member of our Board of Directors.

Christmas is a time for reflection and expectancy. May the burdened be blessed and their burdens made easier to bear. Our thoughts and prayers go out to those members and sons and daughters of other members who are serving our country in the armed forces in many places in the world. We have prayed that this Christmas would bring a season of peace. If only we could unlock a door to a new kind of world in 1970, where "Peace on earth good will toward men," would indeed be a reality. How we have departed from the plan of our Master who admonished us to love one another. Our great country has made wonderful scientific strides. We have gone to the Moon and walked upon its surface, and yet how sad it is to think that we on Earth have not learned to live together in harmony.

Christmas is a beautiful time, if we reflect upon the hope that it brought to the world some two thousand years ago. Let us all renew that hope in our hearts. Let us strive to do our part in bringing about a better world in which to say again, Merry Christmas and a Happy New Year.

Facing the Facts on the National Economic Situation

by Thomas W. Smith

This is the holiday season and the time to be jolly and all that sort of thing. But it is also a time of continuing economic difficulty, if not crisis, and thus it is a time to be realistic. We should have a sound understanding of our economy and where the place of labor finds itself in these periods of drastic changes, both technological and economic.

One of the most useful books issued every biennium is the Report of the Executive Council of the AFL-CIO. This report makes an appraisal of the present and future outlook with regard to the welfare of organized labor. The report goes further; it makes an assessment of the economy and our society in an effort to appraise the future potentials, not only for organized labor, but for all the people.

It has always been the tradition of the union movement to work for all the people. AFL-CIO President George Meany always stresses this fundamental fact in his addresses to labor and to other groups when he makes public appearances. Labor has always worked for the welfare and advancement of all the people.

At the recent convention the Report of the Executive Council to the delegates had much interest and significance to all. Perhaps no section was more vital to the present and future welfare of labor than that devoted to the nation's economy. Since this section is of such great value, it merits a second look.

We have been living in a period of inflation, but this, in the words of the report, was "no classical inflationary condition." And indeed it has not been. In the usual inflation there usually exist too many dollars chasing too few available goods. In our domestic situation such has not been the case. We have not had widespread shortages and our industry has been operating at about 84 per cent of capacity with new plants being set up to meet rising consumer demand. Thus the basic conditions of inflation demanding Government restrictions were not present.

The report notes that several factors operated to dampen the economy such as:

—passage of a temporary surtax which withdrew about $11 billion from the economy;

—a hold-down by Congress on Federal outlays;

—an increase in Social Security taxes, effective in 1969, drawing off some $1.5 billion a year from business and the citizen;

—a shift in the money policy of the Federal Reserve from one of expanding the money supply to a tight money policy.

With this as a background, other things began happening. The prime interest rates began climbing and on June 9, 1969 the major banks raised the prime rate to 8½ per cent—an unprecedently high figure. This new level, says the report "brought up the basic price of money 31 per cent in a year."

Now what happens when the interest rates go up? Everybody loses. One of the most immediate effects is felt in construction where builders' loans and mortgage rates skyrocket. In this situation homebuilders postpone building new houses and commercial buyers put their blueprints back on the shelf until more favorable rates return. The postponement goes far beyond homes, it extends to schools, hospitals, roads, all sorts of public buildings and the whole range of business, commercial and industrial construction.

This all means bad news for all of us. The whole economic machine slows down. The Council's report looks over the first half of the year and views the following trends as clearly evident:

"The real volume of total national production in the first half of 1969 increased at the yearly rate of only 2.6 per cent—down from 6.2 per cent annual rate in the first half of 1968 before the slowdown started.

"By July, housing starts were down to a yearly rate of 1.3 million—from 1.8 million rate in January—and they were heading down.

"Retail sales expenditures, in the April-June quarter were only 1.4 per cent above the level achieved in the previous summer. And that small increase was less than the rise in retail prices of consumer goods—indicating a slight decline in the real volume of goods sold by retail stores.

"The buying power of the average non-supervisory worker's weekly after-tax take-home pay, in June, was slightly less than a year before. Actually, the rank and file workers' real weekly take-home pay in the early months of 1969, was less than in the year 1965.

AFL-CIO calls for all-out support of striking GE workers

The AFL-CIO has taken the unprecedented step of asking each member of its 121 affiliates to contribute $1 to support the nationwide strike against General Electric.

AFL-CIO President George Meany announced that a $13.6 million goal has been set and added: "If it takes more, we'll raise it."

He said other fund raising devices will be used as the strike continues.

A total of 150,000 GE workers are involved in the strike which began Oct. 26. They are members of 10 AFL-CIO affiliates plus three unaffiliated unions.

"This is a struggle against a company which, as the second U.S. Court of Appeals has declared, is determined to destroy not only the unions but the whole process of collective bargaining," Meany said.

"Therefore, this is not just a fight for justice by the GE workers; it is a fight for survival by the American trade union movement. And the American trade union movement intends to survive."

Meany's announcement followed a meeting with a special committee of the Federation's Executive Council, named to mobilize union financial resources for the strike. The committee comprises Steelworker's President I. W. Abel, Longshoremen's President Thomas W. Gleason, and IBEW Secretary Joseph D. Keenan.

Meany said he had instructed William L. Kircher, AFL-CIO Director of Organization, to place his nationwide network of regional offices at the disposal of the GE strikers.

Meanwhile, the strike remains solid at 280 GE plants in 33 states. It is the first time that the 13 unions involved have presented a solid front in 23 years of struggling against GE's policy of laying down its own contract terms on a take-it-or-leave-it basis, long known as "Boulwarism" after Lemuel Boulware, an ex-Vice President at GE.

GE's first and only offer was a pay hike of 20 cents an hour plus an additional five to 25 cents for skilled workers, and wage reopeners in two succeeding years.

Ability to pay is not an issue as the company admits to a 14.8% after taxes increase in profits between 1966 and 1968, plus a 5% per year increase in employee productivity.

The unions point out that the wage increases won three years ago have been wiped out by rising living costs to which GE has contributed by raising prices.

The 13 unions involved have a combined membership of some 8,700,000. They include the IUE and the United Electric Workers which together have the largest GE representation, the Machinists, the IBEW, the UAW, the Teamsters, the Carpenters, the Flint Glass Workers, the AIW, the Plumbers, the Sheet Metal Workers, the Steelworkers and the Technical Engineers.

Advice for GE

President Nixon had some sound advice for General Electric Co. the other day, advice that GE might well take to heart.

The President was talking to the Inter-American Press Association in Washington about the necessity for achieving a "mature partnership" of all the nations of the Americas, a partnership that should be guided by a simple principle:

"Give-and-take is better than take-it-or-leave-it."

We're not sure if this constitutes government interference in labor-management relations, but we would urge GE to heed the President's very sound advice.

'CONTRACT STINKS' reads one of the picket signs as General Electric strikers at IUE Local 320 picket the big Syracuse, N.Y. plant. Almost 150,000 workers, members of 13 international unions, are striking GE across the country.

"Don't buy G E"

On Friday, November 28, the AFL-CIO launched a nationwide boycott against all General Electric products including Hotpoint Products.

This boycott action is taken in the hope that GE will abandon its take-it-or-leave-it position and bargain in good faith.

A successful conclusion depends upon the whole-hearted cooperation of every union member including his family, friends and neighbors.

President George Meany has called upon the International Labor Unions to rally their entire memberships behind the GE strikers by mobilizing their purchasing power on behalf of decent union contracts.

Here are some of the things that need to be done:

1. The message—"Don't Buy GE"—should be spread by every possible means. Meetings, bulletin board notices, etc.

2. Retailers should be informed of the boycott, urged to stop selling GE products and allocate advertising and promotion to products of other manufacturers. We do not want to hurt retail sales. We want consumers to purchase what they need but not to purchase GE products.

3. Informational picket lines should be established in front of all retail outlets featuring GE products.

4. Senior Citizen and women's auxiliary groups should be contacted to man these informational picket lines during peak shopping hours, especially during the day when members are working.

5. The buying public should be urged to halt all purchases of GE products from light bulbs to Color TVs.

6. Purchasing agents at every level of government should be urged to halt all buying of GE products.

7. GE has forced the boycott to take place, just as it has forced 150,000 workers to go on strike.

Under Two Flags?

IPP&AU gives $25,000 to GE strikers

The Board of Directors of the International Printing Pressmen's Union has authorized a contribution of $25,000 to striking employees of General Electric. This action was in response to an appeal by AFL-CIO President George Meany to all International Unions.

President Meany is also asking all AFL-CIO unions to contribute $1.00 per member to the G.E. Strikers Relief Fund. President DeAndrade in a special letter to all IPP&AU local union officers and members requested that each local take steps to reach the National goal, as set by President Meany, $1.00 per member, quickly, either by direct contribution from the treasury or by individual solicitation.

Coast to coast rallies are presently being held and others are being organized. We urge our members to take an active part in this effort.

President DeAndrade called attention to the fact that the International Printing Pressmen's Union has a special obligation in this particular strike. These same union brothers, who are now involved in an all out strike not only to preserve the Union but the process of collective bargaining itself, came to our aid immediately in both the Her-Ex and Kingsport Press strikes, giving substantial sums of money and lending moral support to the members, as well as serving on the picket line.

Please make checks payable to GE Strike Relief Fund and forward to President Anthony J. DeAndrade, IPP&AU, 1730 Rhode Island Ave., N.W., Washington, D.C. 20036. They will in turn be forwarded to Secretary-Treasurer Lane Kirkland of the AFL-CIO.

What is Boulwarism?

The term "Boulwarism" refers to a company program to thwart normal collective bargaining. It was devised by Lemuel Boulware, a Vice President of General Electric Company, and used successfully for nearly twenty years, until this year's show-down.

This policy calls for continuous and intensive communications with workers, all year round, never acknowledging the existence of unions except at contract time. It prescribes a "bargaining" technique under which GE listens to union proposals for weeks or even months prior to contract expiration, making no substantive response; and then, at a time it chooses, GE presents a start-to-finish "first and final" offer which it refuses to improve by so much as a penny. The company offer is merchandised direct to workers by massive use of the communications system.

Net Profit Record Set

A record net profit of $96.4 million in the first nine months of 1969 has been reported by Weyerhaeuser Co. This amount was up $16.2 million, a 20 per cent increase over the same period of 1968. Earnings per share of common stock was $1.60 during the period, a 26 per cent increase over the like period of 1968.

Sales were $877.2 million, up $110 million (14 per cent) over the first nine months of 1968.

Third quarter sales of $301.5 million set an all-time quarterly sales record and compared with $282.7 million for the third quarter of 1968.

The Education and Information Committee met at International Union Headquarters on Oct. 28-29, 1969 for the second time this year.

Attending the session are: Howard Sullivan (left), director of the Technical Education Dept.; Leo Vohsen, St. Louis Pressmen's Union No. 6; Tom Cohoon, Chicago Printing Specialties Union No. 415; Frank Calderone, Los Angeles Pressmen's Union No. 78; Eddie Volotko, Houston Newspaper Pressmen's Union No. 43; Daniel McPherson, Boston Newspaper Pressmen's Union No. 3; Thomas W. Smith, Managing Editor News and Views.

Chairman John Dopp, Chicago Pressmen's Union No. 3; Walter Allen, director of Education and Information; Ralph Scott, director of the Research Dept.; Michael McNally, Denver Pressmen's Union No. 40; William Roberts, Chicago Paper Handler's Union No. 2; Tom Osborne, Toronto Pressmen's Union No. 10; John Steele, Toronto Printing Specialties Union No. 466, and James O'Keefe, New York Paper Handler's Union No. 1.

Education & Information Committee meets in Washington

The 11-man Committee on Education and Information met on October 28 and 29 at the International Union headquarters, reviewing activities of the E. & I. Department and making recommendations for future programs.

The Committee heard a progress report from Walter Allen, Director of the Department, which listed various meetings attended and some educational sessions conducted. Director Allen discussed the administrative experience of processing the IPP&AU Scholarship Awards contest. He also reported on various articles prepared and published by News and Views and some of the educational and organizing materials printed and distributed.

Supplementary reports on related education and information matters were reported by Ralph Scott, Research Director, Howard Sullivan, Director of the Technical Education and Apprenticeship Department, and Tom Smith, Managing Editor of News and Views.

The Committee spent several hours evaluating current problems related to education and information. Some dealt with services of the Research Department. Recommendations included new newspaper manning charts, and the Department serving as a clearing house for arbitration decisions.

The Committee expressed general satisfaction with the contents of the unions journal, News and Views. It viewed with favor the possibility of incorporating the American Pressman Reports as a section appearing quarterly in the News and Views.

Progress was noted and approved in the updating of commercial apprentice course material and recommended top priority be given to revisions in the newspaper apprentice courses. It also requested that the Apprentice Department prepare a set of instructions for operation of joint union-employer apprenticeship committees along with appropriate standards.

The E. & I. Committee devoted several hours in a planning session on the projected educational seminars in 1970. The meeting concluded with a discussion of needed future programs and activities of the Department.

Fred Roblin retires, editor for 17 years

Fred Roblin, managing editor of American Pressman Reports, retired October 31 after serving 17 years on the International Union staff.

Roblin, former editor of the Harriman (Tenn.) Record, joined the International staff in February 1952. For the next nine years his duties included public relations work, associate editorship of The American Pressman, writing institutional and organizational material and for an interim period, serving as director of the Apprenticeship Department.

He was appointed editor of The American Pressman by the International Board of Directors in May 1961, and served in that capacity until the publication was discontinued in December 1968.

For the past year he has been managing editor of American Pressman Reports, the quarterly technical journal of the International Union.

During his 17 years on the staff, Roblin authored numerous booklets and promotional materials. Two of his best known works are: "A Keepsake of the IPP&AU," written in 1964 to commemorate the 75th anniversary of the International Union, and "The Development of the Printing Press, 1450-1965," which appeared in the 75th anniversary edition of The American Pressman.

President Anthony J. DeAndrade, commenting on the retirement, expressed his appreciation to him for his years of faithful and loyal service and wished him the very best in the years to come.

At present, Fred Roblin and his wife are living at Pressmen's Home but expect to move into their recently purchased Morristown (Tenn.) home in the near future.

Court dismisses Kingsport Press complaint against Detroit School Board

On February 20, 1967, Kingsport Press, Inc., following the adoption by the Detroit School Board of a resolution which the Company thought discriminatory and damaging, filed a complaint in Federal Court which sought a declaratory judgment and injunctive relief.

Spoksemen for the Detroit Allied Printing Trades Council, the Wayne County AFL-CIO, the AFL-CIO Union Label Department, and the Allied Kingsport Press Unions (which had been on strike since March 11, 1963), each had asked the Detroit School Board not to purchase school text books produced in the struck plant. The Board agreed to what could be interpreted as a partial boycott of Kingsport Press-produced books.

The Company sought a declaration that the Board action was illegal. The Allied Kingsport Press Unions moved to intervene as party defendants and asked dismissal of the complaint. The Board presented ten arguments answering the allegations and sought a summary judgment.

The hearing on the motions was heard on March 5, 1969 (more than two years after the complaint was filed). On July 28, 1969, the Court granted the unions' motion to intervene as party defendants.

On November 20, 1969, United States District Judge Thaddeus M. Machrowicz, filed a seven-page Memorandum Opinion and Order granting motion for summary judgment and dismissal.

CLC Personnel Changes

OTTAWA (CPA)—Donald MacDonald, president of the Canadian Labor Congress, has announced a series of changes in the national staff of the CLC.

Charles Bauer, 42, becomes assistant director of the public relations department. Rheal Bastien, 52, Buckingham, Que., becomes assistant director in the organization department. Arthur Kube, 34, of Kingston, becomes co-ordinator of white-collar activities in the department of organization. Miss Dawn Ventura, 29, of Ottawa, has been appointed an associate in the research department.

Mr. Bauer was assistant public relations director for the Canadian Union of Public Employees.

Mr. Bastien was a travelling auditor with the Congress. He held various offices in Federal Local Union 165 at Buckingham, before joining the staff of the Trades and Labor Congress as an organizer in 1953.

Mr. Kube was born in Poland and was active in the trade union movement before coming to Canada. He has worked as a CLC representative in Sudbury and Kingston. He will be stationed in Ottawa.

Miss Ventura, a specialist in statistics, has been on the staff of the Economic Council of Canada.

Case load hits new high

The case load of the National Labor Relations Board which has been growing steadily ever since the agency was established in 1935, hit a new high record during the second quarter of this year.

The Board reported that during the April-June period, 8,693 unfair labor practice charges and election petitions were filed as compared with 8,068 during the same period a year ago.

The 5,168 charges of unfair labor practices were the highest ever filed in the 34 year history of the Board. Of these, 3,276 were filed against employers and 1,892 against unions.

CWC director challenges Canadians to meet low-income housing needs

OTTAWA (CPA)—The Canadian government has contributed over three and a half billion dollars in direct mortgage lending of publicly raised funds to private developers, according to Michael Wheeler, Research Director of the Canadian Welfare Council.

Most of this money has been used to build homes for the middle and upper income groups who don't need it, he said, and this in fact involves a substantial subsidy to these groups.

The paradox is that there has been no public outcry about this help to people with money, but there is repeated pressures against public housing for low income groups.

Money is being channelled into homes for the middle and upper income groups raises no protest "on the contrary a repeated refrain of the Federal-Provincial Conference on Housing in December 1967 and of numerous housebuilders' conventions is the need for more of the same.

"The public housing program, on the other hand, which has received one-tenth of the amount, but which is directed to low-income families, is under repeated pressure to justify itself."

This amounts to a prejudice against providing housing for lower income families.

At the root of this prejudice is the indifference of Canadians to the housing dilemma of low-income people, Mr. Wheeler said.

One possible answer, he thinks, is the establishment of citizens' housing associations that will fight for the point-of-view of low-income people.

Concludes the CWC Research Director: "The humanity of social policy depends on the courage, the imagination, the persistence and the success with which the ideals of social justice are promoted."

These citizens' housing associations could act as a spur to political action.

"For the failure to act on the housing needs of people is a failure of political will."

Union Label Dept. issues Yule fund appeal for Hearst strikers

Striking and locked-out unionists at Hearst's Los Angeles Herald-Examiner will be facing their third Christmas on the picket line since the strike began Dec. 15, 1967. But for the second year in a row, the AFL-CIO Union Label Department will be working to see that the strikers' families have a merry Christmas.

This year, as last, the Union Label Department is sending a special "Tri-Hardship" fund appeal for Christmas to 30,000 local unions (including Guild locals) and state and central labor bodies.

Contributions will be divided evenly between the Herald-Examiner Joint Strike-Lockout Council, strikers at Kingsport (Tenn.) Press and California grape strikers.

In Los Angeles, meanwhile the Strike-Lockout Council sent out an appeal for additional funds to intensify its advertising boycott activities during the Christmas season.

The strikers' appeal, issued by Strike-Lockout Director William R. Robertson, said that the striking unions are "desperately short of funds needed in the all-out fight against the rich Hearst empire."

With the advent of the holiday season and its "lush newspaper advertising potential," Robertson said, "the money we appeal for now would be earmarked for a new and vigorous radio-television ad campaign supporting our other efforts.

"It would be tragic if we missed this golden opportunity to keep our enemy from cashing in on Christmas advertising," Robertson added, calling for a "Christmas offensive" in the struggle against Hearst.

Joint bargaining between Hearst and representatives of the striking and locked-out unions continued Oct. 30. The session was devoted to a discussion of issues the company said represented a common thread running through the contract dispute, including Hearst proposals for non-union foremen, a no-strike clause and weakening of hiring and jurisdiction clauses.

Hearst told the unions it would not fire employees now working behind picket lines to make room for union members on strike or locked out nor would it require them to join a union.

Discussion of Hearst's proposal for a no-strike clause was continued at a joint bargaining session Nov. 12.

Strike supporters are taking to the airwaves to give Los Angeles-area residents the Strike-Lockout Council's message over three television stations and seven radio stations. Speakers have included Sigmund Arywitz, executive secretary of the Los Angeles County Federation of Labor, and a number of other Los Angeles union leaders.

Pickets at the struck Los Angeles Herald-Examiner plant get a welcome break as wives of striking and locked-out unions take over and parade across a main driveway. The strike is in its 24th month.

Meat cutters file charges against Iowa Beef Packers

Chicago—The Meat Cutters filed unfair labor practice charges accusing Iowa Beef Packers, Inc., of forcing a strike and slandering union leaders.

The union's complaint, filed with the National Labor Relations Board, involves a dispute at an Iowa Beef plant in Dakota City, Neb., where union members have been on strike since Aug. 24.

The Meat Cutters filed a petition charging that Iowa Beef conducted a "sustained campaign of vilifying and slandering leaders of the union," circulating false propaganda among other meat packers, union members and the public; spreading "deliberate libels and slanders, including false association of the union with criminal acts including murder."

The petition also charges Iowa Beef with a "scheme and plan designed to chill unionism" at plants outside Dakota City and designed to demonstrate the futility of picking the union as their bargaining representative.

The union charged the company illegally locked out its Mason City, Iowa, workers Oct. 6; and required employees in other union-represented plants to "work in an armed camp."

The AFL-CIO convention in Atlantic City in October backed a boycott of Iowa Beef Products and put the company on the "do not patronize" list.

Building trades wage scales averaged $5.67 an hour on Oct. 1, reports the Bureau of Labor Statistics. The all-trades average rose by 1.5 percent during the third quarter of 1969 matching the corresponding quarter in 1968. Plumbers had the highest average hourly scale among the six leading crafts at $6.38.

Health crisis major concern of trade union movement, Meany says

Deteriorating health care and skyrocketing medical costs have become a major concern of the trade union movement, according to AFL-CIO President George Meany speaking at an AFL-CIO Industrial Union Department conference on the "Crisis in Health Care."

The two-day meeting was held November 13-14 in Washington, D. C. Over 340 representatives of national and international unions, central labor bodies, and state federations heard experts in the medical care field underscore the problems of health care which have reached crisis proportions in the United States.

President Meany noted that Americans are now paying more than $60 billion a year for health care—nearly 7% of the nation's Gross National Product. This is a larger percentage than any other country in the world pays for this essential service.

Yet, infant mortality has been increasing. In 1950 the U. S. was the sixth ranking country in the world. By 1960 this rating had dropped to 11th, and currently the U. S. has dropped to 18th place.

In terms of life expectancy our country has dropped from 13th to 22nd place for males, and from seventh to 10th place for females in recent years.

Medical costs have been going up faster than any other item in the Consumer Price Index. From 1963 to 1968, the daily expense of community hospitals went up by 59% (wages went up only 35% during the same five year period) and soon hospital charges will average $100 a day.

"So, as compared with other countries," President Meany continued, "our record is getting worse instead of better. Yet we are devoting to health care more and a larger proportion of our resources than any other country."

Meany called National Health Insurance, financed through the social security system, the only answer. "It is one the labor movement has advanced for many years but we are more determined to achieve it today than ever before," he said.

IUD President Walter Abell, conference chairman, joined with Meany in urging a national health insurance program, calling it "inevitable."

Unions must expand upon their negotiations with employers for prepaid group health plans, but collective bargaining will never fully meet workers' health needs, Abel pointed out.

"Ultimately," he said, "we must combine labor-management contract provisions on health care with government action, as has been done on privately-negotiated pension plans and social benefits."

Abel, like Meany, emphasized the need for controls on exorbitant doctors' profits and for expanded hospital facilities, reasonable drug prices and the availability of health care for workers and their families.

He said the conference, with its exchange of ideas by panels of experts in the health field scheduled for later sessions, "could very well be a landmark in the rising tide of interest which will develop into major health-care reform in the next few years."

Although the two-day meeting took no actions and was not intended to, views expressed by speakers, panels and participants talking from the floor showed a clean consensus for:

- Enactment of a national health insurance system as the only way of achieving a "right" Congress has often spelled out—the right of all citizens to adequate medical care.
- Government action to expand the nation's hospitals and health facilities, train more doctors and nurses, control skyrocketing medical costs and increase health research.
- Greater emphasis by unions on negotiating new health plans and improving existing ones, with special consideration given to optional prepaid group health programs.

Conference delegates were charged with the responsibility of alerting their members to the health crisis and developing comprehensive programs to take care of the nation's health care needs.

Run-Away Plants Train Mexicans

MEXICALI, Mex.—Mexican newspapers report that a mobile training unit from the United States, property of the Office of Economic Opportunity, has been loaned to a private U.S.-Mexico Commission to train Mexican workers for employment in run-away American plants along the border here. The training has been in electronics presumably to provide workers for electronics companies that have crossed the border to take advantage of low-wage labor.

Community role widens range of union services

ATLANTIC CITY—Active labor participation in community affairs was cited by the convention as a force in helping to make communities "more representative of the people and more responsive to the people's needs."

To make this more effective, all AFL-CIO affiliates were urged to establish community services committees and to designate full-time community services directors whenever possible.

Personal and family needs not met by union contracts must be met by extending services "beyond the plant gates and the collective bargaining agreement into the neighborhood and the community as a whole," the convention said.

But while such voluntary efforts were lauded, the convention declared that the government must assume "full responsibility" for meeting "the basic health, welfare and educational needs of the American people."

The Administration's current campaign to stimulate voluntary citizen action in American life, while "laudable," should not "divert the people from this hard truth," the convention said.

Voluntary agencies were urged to make clear to the Administration that "only major governmental action and substantial appropriations of government funds will basically solve many of the social and economic problems confronting our people."

Second scholarship program announced by Vice-President Clarence Schroeder, Scholarship Committee Chairman

If you have a son or daughter graduating from high school in 1970 who plans to continue his or her education, you particularly should be interested in this announcement. If you are among the thousands of members who are not presently faced with the serious problem of financing your children's higher education, you should be sharing a feeling of pride that our Union is helping some parents cope with this responsibility.

We are pleased to announce that the International Union, for the second time, is awarding five scholarships of $500 each to children of members for study at any accredited college, university, school of nursing, or any other institution of higher learning. The award winner may select any field of study.

Awards will be made on a competitive and regional basis according to the location of the local union of which the parent is a member. The five regions will embrace the following broad areas: Eastern States, Central States, Southern and Mid-Atlantic States, Western States and a region consisting of Canada, Alaska and Hawaii.

Any student completing high school requirements and entering college or some other institution of higher learning in the fall of 1970, and whose parent or guardian has been an I.P.P. & A.U. member in continuous good standing for one year prior to December 15, 1969, is eligible to make preliminary application for a scholarship award.

The scholarship application form when completed, must be signed by the President or Secretary of the local union in which the parent or guardian is a member. The deadline for preliminary applications is February 15, 1970. Applications received after that date will be disqualified.

Prospective candidates must take the Scholastic Aptitude Test offered by the College Entrance Examination Board, a non-profit organization that provides tests and other educational services for schools and colleges.

The awards will be granted on the basis of scholastic ability, without regard to the course of study the winner chooses to follow.

Applicants who qualify for the second screening will receive a final application form to be completed and returned to I.P.P. & A.U. Headquarters prior to April 1, 1970. In addition to a transcript of grades, this form also requires a letter of recommendation from the applicant's high school principal. Letters from other officials or public persons are optional.

Winners will be selected by an impartial and independent Selection Committee composed of three staff members from the AFL-CIO in Washington, D.C. The Director of Education for the AFL-CIO, will serve as Chairman of the Selection Committee.

The IPP.&A.U. Scholarship Program was initiated by the Board of Directors of the International Union and obtained the approval of the delegates attending the 1968 Convention. The program is to be financed with monies from the Memorial and Endowment Fund. Serving on the Scholarship Committee of the Board of Directors are Vice Presidents J. Frazier Moore, Don McCaughan and Clarence G. Schroeder.

The Scholarship Award Program attracted more than 150 entries last year. It is anticipated that twice that number will apply this year.

Winners will be announced as soon as possible after final entries are completed. However, the award becomes official only when the student enters the college of his or her choice in the fall semester of 1970.

Rules for scholarship award competition

1. The 1970-1971 scholarship awards competition of the International Printing Press and Assistants' Union (hereafter referred to as the I.P.P.&A.U.) is open to high school seniors to be graduated in January or June of the current school year, and recent high school graduates who, by September 1, 1970 will not have completed more than a half-year of college. Previous scholarship winners are not eligible to enter this contest.

2. To be eligible, the applicant must be a son, daughter, step-son, step-daughter, or legally adopted child of a member of the I.P.P.&A.U. with continuous membership for at least one year prior to December 15, 1969. Children of officers or of employees of the International Union are not eligible to compete for a scholarship.

3. Five awards of $500 each will be made on a competitive (regional) basis according to the location of the local union of which the parent is a member. One award only will be made in each of five regions. The regional areas, based on membership concentration, are as follows:

REGION 1—Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, New York, Rhode Island, Connecticut and Pennsylvania.

REGION 2—Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, Wisconsin, Minnesota and Iowa.

REGION 3—New Jersey, Delaware, Maryland, District of Columbia, Virginia, West Virginia, Kentucky, Tennessee, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Florida, Arkansas, Oklahoma and Ohio.

REGION 4—Washington, Oregon, California, Arizona, Nevada, Idaho, Utah, New Mexico, Colorado, Wyoming, Montana, South Dakota, North Dakota, Nebraska, Kansas, Missouri and Texas.

REGION 5—Canada, Alaska and Hawaii.

Applications

4. All applications and inquiries relative to the Scholarship Program should be forwarded to the International Printing Pressmen and Assistants' Union of North America, Department of Education and Information, 1730 Rhode Island Avenue, N.W., Washington, D.C. 20036.

5. The first step to be taken by each applicant is to fill out the preliminary application appearing on this page, obtaining appropriate signatures of local union officers. Upon receipt of this form, the applicant will be sent a final application with other instructions.

6. All applicants must take a Scholastic Aptitude Test (SAT) of the College Entrance Examination Board (CEEB) if available, or the equivalent where such tests are not available. Arrangements for this examination should be made with high school counselors or principals. If an applicant is entering an institute of higher learning, other than college, which does not require scholastic aptitude tests, this information should be stated with the preliminary application.

7. It shall be the applicant's responsibility to make certain that SAT scores, or other such college entrance test scores, are included with scholastic records from the applicant's high school.

8. The period of application shall be from December 15, 1969 to February 15, 1970. The application below must be returned by February 15, 1970.

9. The awards will be made on the basis of the applicant's grades achieved on College Board Admissions Tests which include the Scholastic Aptitude Test (SAT) and Achievement Tests in various subjects, and on high school grades, school evaluations, and recommendations concerning the student. All final forms, test information and final applications must be furnished to the International Union Headquarters no later than April 1, 1970.

10. Selection of the winners will be made by a committee composed of three staff members of the AFL-CIO. The Director of the AFL-CIO's Department of Education, will serve as chairman of the committee.

11. The winners of the I.P.P.&A.U. Scholarship Awards will be selected as quickly as possible after the closing date, hopefully no later than May 1, 1970.

Selection of College by Winners

12. The recipient of a scholarship award may attend any accredited college or university, school of nursing, or any other institute of higher learning. Application for a scholarship does not constitute application for admission to college. The winner of a scholarship must conduct his own negotiation with the college of his choice for admission to the school.

Payment of Scholarships

13. Upon the enrollment of a a scholarship award winner at an accredited college or university or other school of his or her choice, the amount of the scholarship award will be deposited with the school, in the name of the student and will be disbursed on his or her behalf to cover authorized expenditures.

The International Printing Pressmen and Assistants' Union of North America cannot accept any responsibility for the conduct, personal affairs, debts, or obligations of a scholarship winner, and therefore, the Union shall not be liable for same in any manner.

Obligations of Scholarship Winners

14. The scholarship winner must enter the school of his or her choice not later than the fall of the year in which his or her scholarship is awarded. Except for military service, illness, or other exceptional and extenuating circumstances, the scholarship winner will be required to continue his courses without interruption.

Military Service

15. If the studies of the scholarship award winner are delayed or interrupted by military service, the award will be held in abeyance during such military service. The scholarship recipient should apply for reinstatement of his scholarship within three months after discharge and enroll in a college not later than the next succeeding year.

Illness

16. An illness, accident, or any exceptional and extenuating situation which delays the scholarship recipient from commencing or continuing his college studies will be regarded as an acceptable reason for holding the scholarship in abeyance.

Scholarship winners who may be prevented from starting or continuing their college courses because of illness or accident should promptly advise the I.P.P. & A.U., Department of Education and Information in Washington, D. C.

If the scholarship award is forfeited by a winner, the award will be given to the next highest eligible contestant.

Permanency of the Program

17. The Scholarship Program has been established with the confident expectation that it will be continued indefinitely. It is recognized that conditions may require changes or modifications. The right to modify or terminate the program, in whole, or in part, is reserved. In the event of such change, however, scholarships in effect will be continued for their duration.

GEORGIA SENATOR KEY TO CLOSING OF BILLION DOLLAR UNION TAX LOOPHOLE

WASHINGTON, D.C., October 31, 1969 -- A vote which will be cast this weekend by Senator Herman Talmadge (D-Georgia) will break an 8-8 Senate Finance Committee deadlock and decide the fate of a proposal designed to close a major tax loophole by denying tax exemptions to labor unions engaging in partisan political activities.

The absence of Senator Talmadge this afternoon produced a tie vote on Senator Paul Fannin's (R-Arizona) proposed amendment to the tax reform bill, according to a spokesman for an organization which is urging support for the amendment.

Executive Vice President Reed Larson of the National Right to Work Committee said, "We are informed that the Finance Committee's record will be kept open through the weekend, even though its final executive session on the tax reform bill was held today. Many of our Georgia members have expressed confidence that Senator Talmadge will vote for the Fannin Amendment.

SENATOR TALMADGE FAILS TO VOTE

"Senator Herman Talmadge, a Democrat from the Right to Work state of Georgia was the only Senator who did not vote and his failure to vote killed the amendment (tie votes kill amendments in Committee). Senator Talmadge was at the Committee meeting in the morning but left before the Fannin amendment came up for vote and did not return."

How Open Shop Crowd Tries to Coerce Votes

At left is an example of how the fine hand of the National Right to Work Committee was (1) behind the Fannin amendment, and (2) tried to coerce a vote for it—and failed. The segment above the jagged line is a picture of an NRTWC news release October 31, the day of the tie vote on the Fannin amendment in the Senate Finance Committee. It is a clear effort to coerce, or embarrass, a U.S. Senator into voting for the amendment. The segment below the jagged line is from an NRTWC press release November 3 and is a direct quote of Reed Larson, NRTWC executive vice president. It is retribution for the senator's failure to vote as the NRTWC had said publicly he would.

Halloween Trick

Sen. Paul Fannin (R-Ariz.) had a trick, not a treat, for the labor movement on October 31, the day of Halloween night. He is not "The Great Pumpkin."

He brought before the Senate Finance Committee a proposed amendment to the tax bill that would deny tax exemption to labor organizations for engaging in political activities.

A registration and get-out-the-vote drive, if funded in any way by dues or assessments, would be out.

Candidate support would be out.

Lobbying, presumably, would be out.

Other political activities: Out.

All of this at all levels—national, state and community.

The amendment was staved off in committee by a tie vote, 8-8, but Fannin is expected to bring it to the Floor anyway.

Fannin, in his continuing harassment against unions—he has in the past introduced a series of other restrictive measures—apparently is doing the work of the National Right to Work Committee and like-minded groups.

Millions may be cheated on wages

The number of workers cheated out of their pay due under the Federal Wage and Hour Law may well reach into the millions.

Rudolph Oswald, an economist for the AFL-CIO's Department of Research, declared that while investigators for the Labor Department's Wage and Hour Division had discovered that about half a million workers were being underpaid, he pointed out:

"The investigators visit only about three percent of the establishments covered by the act. They respond to complaints and make investigations in areas where they suspect violations. But the total number of violations is much larger than those actually uncovered—perhaps three to four times as many as those actually discovered by investigators."

Vigorous enforcement of the Federal wage-and-hour law is the only way to curb employer violations that most often victimize workers at the lowest end of the economic scale, an AFL-CIO economist declared.

"In spite of the talk of law and order," charged Rudolph Oswald, "the employer who robs a man of $50 in his paycheck often gets away with it." Oswald said that the official tally of Federal wage and hour violations in 1968 was $89 million in underpayments.

Oswald rejected the contention that boosting the minimum wage from the present $1.60 to $2 an hour, as strongly urged by the AFL-CIO, would lead to an even higher level of violations.

"The violations come largely from chiseling employers who under-cut," he said, and raising the minimum wage would not necessarily add more to that group. Most employers, he said, do try to comply with minimum wage, overtime pay and equal pay for equal work requirements, and they should be concerned about employers who evade the law.

"Those who cheat are unfair competition to employers who do try to abide by the law," he declared.

UNION LABEL AND SERVICE TRADES DEPT., AFL-CIO

Unions must be in politics

The arguments for unions engaging in political activity are legion and have been advanced not just by unions, but by many parties without any ax to grind. For example:

"Political activity is a legitimate if not indispensable means of advancing the cause of organized labor."—Yale Law Journal, 1956.

"Political activities may be germane to collective bargaining insofar as favorable legislation, or the defeat of unfavorable legislation, strengthen the union's bargaining position."—Virginia Law Review, 1959.

Limits to bargaining

Unions have "an inherent interest" in lending financial support to certain political causes."—Villanova Law Review, 1958.

"It is often debated whether unions should 'go into politics.' Really, they have no choice in the matter. They are automatically in politics because they exist under a legal and political system which has been generally critical of union activities. The conspiracy suit and the injunction judge have been a problem for unions from the earliest times. A minimum of political activity is essential in order that unions may be able to engage in collective bargaining on even terms."—Yale Prof. Lloyd G. Reynolds, 1959, Labor Economics and Labor Relations.

In his book, Reynolds discusses two other practical reasons for labor political activity.

Legislation quicker

First, certain objectives in which labor has an interest cannot be achieved at all through collective bargaining. These include public education, social insurance of various kinds, adequate housing, effective anti-depression measures.

Labor must also lobby

Secondly, certain objectives which might be achieved through collective bargaining can be achieved much faster through legislation. Among these: minimum wages, maximum hours, child labor laws.

Reynolds assigned prime responsibility for the progress of social legislation to "the increasing political awareness of trade unions."

Also, in his book, he pointed out that lobbying activities by interests directly opposed to labor had increased significantly. And since the book was written, such interest groups as the medical profession, the Chamber of Commerce, the National Association of Manufacturers and various coalitions of right wing organizations, have gone whole-hog into election activities.

Yet, there seems no parallel pressure from Fannin and friends to restrict the political activities of non-labor groups.

The American Medical Association, for example, can block a nomination, as it did that of Dr. John Knowles earlier this year. Its political arm, AMPAC, can kick in nearly $700,000 to senatorial and House candidates (a tip-of-the-iceberg figure since it reflects only national AMPAC spending—state AMPAC groups are estimated to spend five times that much politically) and not get a whisper of recrimination.

The NAM can form and fund BIPAC—the Business-Industry Political Action Committee—which pours money into political campaigns.

Fannin and friends should take a little look at history. They'll learn that trade unionism's political activity has a long and honorable record, that no single group in the nation has done as much to involve American citizens in the democratic process as the labor movement.

New Mexico Rejects 'R-T-W' Plank

ALBUQUERQUE—The New Mexico Constitutional Convention voted 49-18 to reject a "right-to-work" provision in a proposed new state constitution.

The margin of defeat was the largest ever recorded on the anti-union measure in this state. Foes of union shop agreements have tried repeatedly to get the measure through the legislature, New Mexico AFL-CIO Secretary-Treasurer Neal Gonzalez reported. He said 17 of the 18 convention delegates from the Albuquerque area voted against the compulsory open shop proposal.

How right is the Right-to-Work law?

The sham of so-called "right to work" laws is being illustrated by unionists in Utah who are opposed to the compulsory open shop statute now on the books in this state.

In leaflets, they are answering employers, the Retail Trade Association, American Medical Association and other groups which have been backing the "work" law.

Here is the leaflet:

I don't want a "right-to-work" law, but if there is to remain such a law in this state, here are a few other things I would like to have included in it:

1. If I were a businessman, I would want to use all the facilities of the Chamber of Commerce and the Retailers Association without belonging to them or paying any dues or fees to them.

2. If I were a manufacturer, I would want to use the facilities of the National Manufacturers Association without cost.

3. If I were a doctor, I would want to be free to practice medicine anywhere I wish without belonging to the American Medical Association.

4. If I were a dentist, I would want to be able to practice dentistry without belonging to any Dental Association.

5. If I were a lawyer, I would want to practice my profession without hindrance from a state law requiring me to belong to the Bar Association.

6. However, I am just a working man. But if the state can keep a law which will protect my "right" to ride the coat tails of my labor association without paying my share of the expenses, I think the same law should entitle me to live in a community and enjoy all the benefits of city facilities without paying taxes to the city. It seems to me to be the same principle exactly.

As a matter of fact, if I can be a free-rider of the labor union I should also be protected by state law in my "right" to be a free-rider of any collective enterprise, be it city, county, state or national government, club, church or whatever it may be.

Taxes on rising company profits down as Canadian personal income taxes increase

OTTAWA (CPA) — Company profits are being revised upwards in a report being prepared for publication by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics.

Another DBS report, already public, shows that taxes on company profits have been decreasing as a percentage of the tax bill while personal income taxes have been increasing.

The DBS report on company profits which should soon be released will be based on company reports to shareholders rather than to the tax collector as formerly.

The new method of calculating profits will indicate that the 1968 total, reported to the tax collector as $2,754,000,000, was actually $3,987,000,000 as reported to shareholders, that is, about 45 percent higher.

A similar discrepancy shows up in 1967—profits reported to the tax collector of $2,421,000,000, reported to shareholders as $3,690,000,000.

However the year-to-year rate of profit increase will be lower with the new method of calculating.

Company reports to the tax collector exclude various items such as capital cost allowances, which permit them to write off the value of machinery and equipment faster than they actually depreciate; deferring allowances from loss years when no taxes are payable and so on.

The report by DBS already issued shows that Canadian companies have been paying a decreasing share of Canada's total income tax bill. At the same time personal income taxes have paid an increasing share.

DBS figures show that corporate profits were 35 percent of all income taxes in 1965. By 1967 they were down to 29 percent of the total.

In 1965 Canadian citizens paid $3,913,000,000 in personal income tax while corporations paid $2,225,000,000 on their income. The corporation share is 35 percent of the total of $6,138,000,000.

By 1967 individuals paid $5,493,000,000 in taxes and corporations $2,208,000,000, totalling $7,701,000,000. The corporate share dropped to 29 percent.

However during the period corporate profits reported dropped about two percent while taxable personal income rose about 21 percent, from $38,902,000,000 to $47,202,000,000. The tax collected on that personal income rose 40 percent.

Company taxes as a percentage of total taxes have dropped because of the way corporations are taxed. It's known as a two-tier system—21.54 percent to 23.54 percent on reported profits up to $35,000, rising to 51.41 to 53.41 percent on profits over $35,000.

But 80 percent of company taxes are paid at the lower rate.

Personal income taxes however are paid on a sliding scale upwards, from 11 percent on the first thousand dollars or less up to 80 percent on amounts over $400,000.

Moreover more and more people have been moving up into the higher tax brackets, being taxed at higher rates on more income.

As the tax table has remained constant since 1960, the effect has often been that people earning more have been paying more and so only maintaining the same standard of living.

This effects lower wage earners too.

A family of four with two children who make $2,000 a year pay no tax. But if the income goes up to $3,000, the tax is 11 percent on the amount above the exemption level.

Rising wages therefore push earners into higher tax brackets with the result that their standard of living may not necessarily improve very much.

Hurting All Over

Everyone seems to be feeling the pinch of rising prices in this country which have shot up 20 percent the last 10 years.

However, according to the International Monetary Fund, other industrial countries have been hit harder the last decade, prices increasing 64 percent in Japan, 47 percent in France, 39 percent in Italy, 36 percent in the United Kingdom and 25 percent in West Germany.

P and I Commission seeks wage-price deal

OTTAWA (CPA)—Labor sources here say the Prices and Incomes Commission is dangling a 5 percent annual wage-increase guidepost before unions on the condition business holds price increases to 2½ percent.

The "2.5 for 5" formula, as these sources are calling it, is what the commission feels will curb runaway inflation.

The formula first became public when Ed Finn, public relations director of the Canadian Brotherhood of Railway, Transport and General Workers, divulged it in his Toronto Star column last month.

Other sources confirmed that commissioners are toying with the 2.5 and 5 formula.

So far, labor seems to be resisting.

Business leaders the commission has met with are not nearly representative enough, labor feels, to commit the entire private sector to holding down prices.

Rents and transportation are notable areas that labor feels need restraint. Unions doubt the commission can accomplish much there with guidelines.

The automobile industry may be in for a Canadian government investigation if rumored price increase for 1970 cars take effect.

New labor law in Saskatchewan

REGINA (CPA)—Saskatchewan's Liberal government renewed what labor feels is an anti-union campaign when it proclaimed (Aug. 15) amendments to the Saskatchewan Trade Union Act that it pushed through the Legislature last spring.

The most contentious amendment grants any striking employee permission to apply for a vote to be conducted after 30 days of a strike to determine whether workers favour accepting the employer's last offer.

Another amendment bans secondary boycotts, and another makes it possible to sue a trade union as a corporate entity.

The amendments were opposed bitterly by New Democratic Party opposition members, who argued that if the amendments passed there would never be a strike of less than 30 days.

Management would have no incentive to reach a settlement until that period of time had elapsed.

The obvious intent of the provision was to take advantage of the financial pressure exerted upon workers and their families when they had been without a pay-cheque for a month, labor argued.

The government majority prevailed, but it was understood that the amendments would not be proclaimed if the province enjoyed relative industrial peace.

It was also understood that they would not be proclaimed before a labor-management review committee had made a report to the government. These implicit agreements have been ignored.

Deputy Opposition Leader Allan Blakeney (NDP, Regina Centre) said, "It is unfortunate that the provincial government chose this time to bring into force contentious amendments to the Trade Union Act.

"Trade unionists have consistently argued that the amendments were unwise and unneeded, and they will damage, not help, labor-management relations. . . . One needs only to look at Quebec and Newfoundland, provinces which have suffered protracted and costly strikes, to know that punitive labor legislation does not bring industrial peace."

Walter Smishek (NDP, Regina North East) also issued a strong protest.

He said, "We now have virtually complete industrial peace in the province. The government committee, composed of government, management and labor, is still studying the Trade Union Act and industrial relations generally.

"The committee has not even submitted an interim report. Thus there can be no justification whatever in proclaiming this notorious, union-busting bill."

Employment rate unchanged

The nation's unemployment rate which shot up to its highest level in two years in September was virtually unchanged in October the Labor Dept. reported.

Although the rate dipped from 4 to 3.9 percent between the two months, The Bureau of Labor Statistics termed the change insignificant. The rates in both months were higher than in any month since October 1967.

George L. P. Weaver, former Assistant Secretary of Labor for International Affairs and Chairman of the Governing Body of the International Labor Organization, has been named Special Assistant to ILO Director General David A. Morse. Based in Washington, Weaver will handle ILO relations with international, regional and governmental organizations which have headquarters there.

1985: Will collective bargaining bring housing allowances and guaranteed employment?

by Ralph Scott, director
IPP&AU Research Department

What will employee benefit plans be like in 1985? In 15 years what fringe items will be finding their way into the contract proposals of unions?

A study released by a Connecticut-based research firm makes an attempt to view into the crystal ball and answer these questions. The underlying basis of the survey was that outside social and economic developments determine the thrust of employee benefit plans. For example the WWII freeze on wage increases is credited with the rapid growth of fringes during that period in our history.

The views of 24 experts, drawn from many varied fields, were solicited in two major steps.

Firstly, each participant made a forecast of several social and economic developments thought to influence fringe benefits, i.e., weekly hours of work, percentage of working women in the labor force, the number of white collar workers in relation to the total labor force, to name just a few.

Secondly, those same experts were asked to forecast benefit developments and continuing trends based on the projections obtained earlier.

The panel came up with a list of ten areas likely to show the greatest expansion in the next 15 years. It is significant that unions will provide the major push for accomplishing this impressive list of benefit improvements:

- The employee's attitude that benefits are rights.
- Elimination of expense to the employee for major medical benefits.
- Inclusion of dental coverage.
- Inclusion of preventative medical care.
- Increased pension income.
- Increases in pensioners' income during retirement to reflect cost-of-living rises.
- Pension portability.
- Use of group purchasing power to obtain favorable insurance rates for employees.
- Longer vacations.
- Increased flexibility in scheduling time off.

Benefit innovations we will witness over the next 15 years, as reported by the survey, are:

—Minimum annual income guaranteed by government.

—Guaranteed employment.

—New types of medical coverage: unwed mother maternity benefits; custodial care; and organ transplants.

—Pensions extended to include costs of recreation, education, medical care, residence and legal fees.

—Cost-of-living adjustment for disability insurance.

—Employer involvement in community affairs.

—Subsidized housing for employees.

—Receive advanced degrees during regular hours of employment.

—More generous time off with pay provisions (25% increase).

—Payment for nonworking travel time.

—Widely available educational leave pay (weeks to a year).

—Several shorter weeks during year.

19 paid holidays for Puerto Ricans

How would you like to have 19 paid holidays every year? The 400 workers at the Puerto Rico Water Resources Authority now have that many under a new contract recently negotiated by the Brotherhood of Railway and Airline Clerks. BRAC says the 19 holidays constitute a new record.

The unusual package provides all of the normal paid holidays enjoyed by most union members in the United States along with some celebrations which are peculiar to Puerto Rico. These include such holidays as the Feast of the Epiphany (Jan. 6); Abolishment of Slavery Day (March 22); and days set aside to honor numerous Puerto Rican heroes. (The Labor News)

How Uncle Sam Spends Your Money?

The average American family paid a total of $2,834 in all types of Federal taxes during 1968, including income taxes, Social Security taxes and excise taxes.

The breakdown below shows that the Federal government spent the lion's share of each family's money for national defense purposes. The breakdown indicates how much the average family pays to support various government expenditures:

National Defense	$1,230
Social Security	495
Interest, Nat'l Debt.	201
Health Services	135
Veterans	116
Commerce & Transportation	110
Education & Manpower	109
Agriculture	82
Public Welfare	79
Space	63
Medical Research	36
Housing & Communities	36
Foreign Aid	.31
International Affairs	29
Natural Resources	27
Tax Collection expenses	16
Post Office	14
Miscellaneous	26

More than $12 billion was lost to the U.S. Treasury because of a major tax loopholes which let the wealthy get by without paying their fair share.

News for and about labor

The U.S. Dept. of Transportation reports that 11.5 percent of both 1968 and 1969 vehicles tested, failed to meet one or more safety standards required by Federal law.

A bill to protect consumers from injury by any of the nation's 200 credit bureaus has been passed by the Senate. The bill, sponsored by Sen. William Proxmire (D.-Wis.) allows damages for consumers injured because of incorrect information given out by credit bureaus, requires credit bureaus to tell persons they are being investigated and requires credit files to be kept up to date and confidential.

More money for health care services for the nation's migratory farm workers and their families, has been requested by the AFL-CIO. Legislation being considered by the Senate's subcommittee on health would continue the program an additional five years — to 1975 — and more than double the dollar ceiling on federal funds. The expansion is needed, the federation said in a statement to the subcommittee, because only one-third of the nation's migratory workers now live or work in areas where health facilities are available.

General Electric's latest announcement of price increases shows "that GE's pricing policy, like its labor relations policy, is based on simple greed," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany charged. The company announced that it is raising prices on electric housewares by an average 3.3 percent. The announcement followed an earlier one of increases on appliances and other products ranging up to 8.5 percent.

The slow down in the economy which has begun to show itself in the unemployment statistics, is now beginning to show in personal income. For the second month in a row, personal income in general showed a slowing down in growth. It was up some $2.5 billion on a seasonally adjusted basis, but the rate of growth was about half the average monthly expansion from January through August.

Veteran screen actor Edward G. Robinson—he has been an actor for 60 years—has been honored by the Screen Actors Guild "for outstanding achievement in fostering the ideals of the acting profession".

The Greater Washington Central Labor Council has graduated seven consumer counselors from its first course to develop such specialists for local unions. The new experts will aid union members on problems ranging from credit contracts to shoddy merchandise.

The Bureau of Labor Statistics reports new cars will cost an average of $107 more than last year's models. About $46 of this amount is accounted for by "quality improvements", says the BLS.

Lee Pressman, veteran labor lawyer and a controversial figure, both within the Roosevelt Administration and the early days of the Congress of Industrial Organizations, is dead at the age of 63 after a long illness.

The strike lasted four months but some 18,000 Canadian Steelworkers have won a 93-cents-an-hour package from International Nickel Co. The 32-month contract calls for average wage increases of 88 cents an hour plus an additional 5 cents if living costs continue to rise.

The California State Agriculture Department has banned the use of the pesticide DDT on 47 different commercial crops including artichokes, celery and peaches. But table grapes were not included on the list, although the AFL-CIO United Farm Workers Organizing Committee has complained that farm workers have been poisoned by DDT sprayed on grapes.

College Education Financing Booklet Now Available

Just off the presses is a new booklet designed to help union members finance their children's college education.

The costs of higher education for eligible and deserving young people are now recognized as a major economic problem to working people, second only to purchasing a home. And yet we would all agree that no child of a fellow union member should be deprived of an opportunity to gain the benefits of higher education because of lack of necessary funds.

Our members can be very proud of our Union's action in providing five $500.00 scholarships each year. At the same time, it is a fact that most of those who did not win are in need of financial aid which the Union cannot provide. This booklet may be a partial answer to all our young who are aspiring to go to college.

The booklet is the result of an inter-union cooperative effort which greatly reduced the cost of printing. Special credit is owed to Miss Ruth Wiencek, Education Coordinator of the Department of Social Action of the International Union of Electrical, Radio and Machine Workers, who edited the booklet and arranged the printing.

A single copy of the booklet will be sent to any union member upon request, at no charge. Your request should be addressed to the Department of Education and Information, International Printing Pressmen and Assistants' Union of North America, 1730 Rhode Island Avenue, N. W., Washington, D. C. 20036.

Trade Unionism is Industrial Democracy

The fact that trade unions themselves bring industrial democracy into economic life has gone largely unnoticed, according to Canadian Labour Congress President Donald MacDonald.

Speaking to the convention of National Defense Employees in Halifax, the CLC head pointed out that when employees of a corporation or a government are organized into a trade union, "a very profound change takes place."

"The employees who had previously accepted an authoritarian rule no longer have to do so.

"By virtue of their trade union organization, they have become partners in the determination of their conditions of employment."

This is evident, the CLC president went on, from their participation "in deciding what they should be paid, how long they should work, what holidays and what fringe benefits they should have.

"They enjoy due process by virtue of a grievance procedure. They are protected against arbitrary dismissal or discipline or layoff.

"In other words, to use the analogy of government, they have a franchise and they are involved in the legislative process."

This very important form of industrial democracy is one which needs to be more universally applied, said Mr. MacDonald, "as it will be with the continued growth of the labour movement and the extension of collective bargaining to those who do not as yet enjoy its benefits."

New Booklet on Union History

FROM THE BEGINNING;
The Rise of American Labor

A 36-page booklet titled "From the Beginning—The Rise of American Labor" has been prepared by the International Union. The well-illustrated and attractive booklet was particularly designed for distribution to new members and apprentices. A copy has been forwarded to each local secretary with instructions to order additional copies from the Department of Education and Information.

How To Fasten Seat Belts

William A. Woodcock, Chief Engineer, General Motors of Canada, says, "The proper way to wear a restraint system is to have the lap belt snug and worn low on the hips so it does not ride over the hip bone. It should be pulled up really taut and particularly when you've got on bulky clothes, such as overcoats and things. . . .

"The shoulder belt should be worn with some slack so that you do commence a jackknife and consequently, it helps to prevent submarining tendency if your upper torso moves ahead. . . .

"I think we're not going to lick this thing until putting on seat belts becomes such a habit that we just don't feel properly dressed for driving unless we're wearing our restraint systems."

National Labor College in offing

The AFL-CIO is taking its first step toward the building of a national labor college with the opening of the AFL-CIO Labor Studies Center.

Sessions at the Center's temporary headquarters in Washington, D.C. will start after December 1, 1969. Its future depends largely on the reaction of labor's leadership.

The Center's first institutes will be open to national leaders, full time officers of state and central bodies and full time staff. Rank and file members and local union officers will be able to attend later as the physical facilities expand and the center finds out what its students want to study.

"We don't know what the market is yet," says Fred Hoehler, executive director of the Center and former professor of Industrial Relations for Michigan State.

The Center's first catalogue shows it plans to go beyond the standard classes offered at many labor educational institutes held in past years.

For example, the Staff Development Program for full time representatives, features an "effective reading" program in addition to classes on labor history, economic principles and American society and civilization.

Top level leadership—members of the AFL-CIO Executive Council and Civil Rights Committee members—will engage in an intensive think-tank on policy issues on civil rights. There are two other civil rights oriented institutes for other groups.

The Building Trades business agent has his own institute which will study the economics of the construction industry, labor law and the equal opportunity programs along with current labor problems.

Technical staff will be able to sharpen their skills at a research staff institute and another on health care planning.

A valuable institute in leadership will be the one on teacher training. Arbitration and labor law institutes are also scheduled.

A leadership training course for farm workers is in the planning stage along with another institute on vocational education.

Applications and further information can be obtained from the AFL-CIO Labor Studies Center, 1500 Massachusetts Avenue, N.W., Washington, D.C. 20005.

Time and Place of Seminars

Most seminars will be on the weekends or possibly Friday, if tied to a scheduled Conference. To the degree possible, the programs will be scheduled so that delegates can travel from home on the first morning of the seminar with the sessions starting in late morning and continuing to early Sunday afternoon. This would limit hotel expense to one night.

Usually the seminars will make use of hotel or motel facilities. In some instances, where lodging and meals can be provided, the seminars will be held on a university campus.

In any case, the seminars will be as centrally located as possible in each State or area, depending upon the geographical distribution of the locals.

The map shows the projected regions in which there will be seminars. Unfortunately, in the areas where locals are thinly populated, most delegates will necessarily need to travel further to attend a seminar.

It is expected that most of the seminars will be scheduled in the Spring and early Summer, with the remainder in the Fall.

Seminar Programs Have Broad Goals

"The subject of our meeting is 'Apathy of Union Members'."

The subject matter of the IPP&AU seminars will be covering three broad areas:

1. Technical developments of the printing industry, apprentice training, and worker retraining programs.
2. Political education and action.
3. Trade union education.

These general subjects will, in most instances be refined to specific subjects such as:

1. Recent Technical Developments in the Printing Processes or
   a. Ways to Upgrade Local Apprenticeship Training Programs
2. The Issues in the 1970 Elections, or
   a. How to Activate Your Local Politically.
3. How to Build a Better Union, or
   a. Preparing for Your Next Contract Negotiations.

The exact subject matter will be governed in part by the requests of area locals or Councils and by the availability of well-versed discussion leaders.

The discussion technique will be used as much as possible, limiting lectures and demonstrations to the introductory phase of the sessions. Whenever possible, groups will be limited to 15-20 persons to encourage maximum discussion.

Discussion leaders will be drawn from the Board of Directors, the AFL-CIO, the Canadian Labour Congress and some universities.

Special attention will be given to the needs and interests of younger union members. Locals will be urged to send some younger members as seminar delegates.

Building better local unions—Goals of union's seminars

The Seminar program is the result of a decision of the Board of Directors to initiate such activities.

The Department of Education and Information is responsible for the administration of the seminars. Further information will be forthcoming in future issues of News and Views.

The Christmas gift price jungle

by Sidney Margolius
News and Views Consumer Expert

While many of the TV-advertised playthings have gone up 10 to 25 per cent this year, on top of last year's 10 per cent rise, clothing gift items are still comparatively reasonable. The popular durable-press shirts for men and boys, for example, have gone up very little—50 cents in some cases. Sweaters and knit shirts, outstanding values last year, are priced at close to last year's levels.

Women, on the other hand, are being pushed through a real fashion munipulation and forced obsolescence. Blouses are fussed up with ruffles, jabots, big sleeves, big bows, psychedelic prints and imitation hippie styles such as fringed ponchos.

All these are aimed at making your present simpler wardrobe obsolete while the new styles themselves will look dated in another year. Their extreme fussiness also limits their usefulness and versatility while raising their price.

The best values for gift giving, for versatility and enduring style, as well as reasonable price, are knit tops and skirts, knit vests and the many attractively-styled sweaters on the market this year. Sweaters are more dressy than ever.

There is one group of toys available at sharply reduced prices which show how exaggerated the original prices were. Some manufacturers are still unloading leftovers and closeouts of last year's playthings. Among those prominently featured are "Little Lost Baby," "Baby Crawl-Along" and "Baby Giggles." These originally were list-priced at $10 or more and now are being offered for as little as $4 and $5.

Another of last year's heavily-advertised toys that some stores are trying to unload at cut prices is the "Mighty Mike Astro Train." It had a mighty $12.88 price last year. This year you can buy it from $3 to $7. In games too, last year's $4.99 "Knock the Clock" is now offered at 99 cents.

When you shop for toys this year you will find even more of a jungle of exaggerated claims of value, sharply varying prices among stores, and competing models of similar toys with varying equipment making it difficult to compare prices.

The variation in equipment and prices is especially noticeable in the popular road racing sets. If you're out to buy a "Johnny Lightning" or "Hot Wheels" track set, be sure you know which model you are shopping for and how many pieces it has.

The claims of value by some stores are grossly exaggerated even though their prices may be comparatively reasonable. Some stores, for example, claim the "Johnny Lightning 500" set (the bigger one) is "regularly $20." Actual prices in various stores range from $9 to $11.

The selling emphasis, and with it the interest of youngsters, has turned more to road racing sets which develop speed from gravity ("Johnny Lightning") and battery-powered impellers (the "Hot Wheels" supercharger). These are more suitable for younger children than the slot-racing sets which are plugged into household current, require more care to keep the slots dust-free and also cost more.

The hazards of some toys revealed by the hearings of the National Commission of Product Safety make it imperative that parents and other gift givers select carefully. In my own opinion, all toys that plug into household current, such as electrical housekeeping toys, have an inherent hazard for younger children. Battery-operated playthings are basically safer.

In buying a tricycle, make sure that the rubber hand grips won't come off easily. One little boy lost an eye when he fell against the unprotected metal hand grip of the trike he was riding.

Scooter boards obviously are hazardous because the small wheels do not permit the scooter to pass over even small objects in its path. Sharp stops have been another frequent cause of accidents.

Scrutinize carefully the toys you think of giving to very young children, including so called "crib toys." One young couple barely rescued their six-months old baby in time when he twisted the cord of his toy telephone around his neck. The telephone had been advertised as a "crib" toy, the product safety commission reports.

FOOD BUYING CALENDAR: Beef prices have come down from last summer's highs, but still cost 10-15 cents more than a year ago. Broilers are in heavy supply and more cut-price specials are available.

Budgets over people?

SAN FRANCISCO, Calif. (PAI) —Sandra Vitorelo, a 22-year-old sufferer, wrote President Nixon protesting his proposed cuts in Federal funds for medical research, including cancer.

A reply came from the White House, explaining the budget cuts and wishing her a "speedy and complete recovery." Sandra was too weak even to open the letter. A few days later she died.

Christmas Is Beautiful

Down through the years there have been literally thousands of stories written about Christmas. They have all varied in style, purpose, wording and fact! However, they all portray the happiness and joy which glistens and brightens all people around the world during that time.

Union members and their families and friends, have all participated in the traditional celebrations which appropriately observe the season honoring the coming of the Christ child. It is during Christmas when the words "Peace on Earth, Good Will towards men" actually ring loud enough to let hostile men reflect seriously on the real meaning of brotherhood.

As the Christmas Season approaches, every trade union member should ponder the impact his purchasing power has on our economy and his fellow brothers and sisters. All the colorful and decorative items involved in the Christmas Season; the artificial tree, lights, bells, artificial snow, nativity scenes, bulbs, are all made by union members. But, they are also being made by cheap labor overseas and imported into this country. Will a Union member buy the cheap imported products this Christmas only to eliminate the job of a fellow union member by next Christmas?

The Christmas shopping list is full of items: radios, TV's, shoes, sweaters, suits, ties, wagons, dolls, etc.—all of these are made in America—they are also made by cheap labor and imported into this country and sold!

This is America and we do have a choice, the right to buy or not to purchase. We can select the cheap import and save pennies now and then slowly but surely watch all the benefits and the wage scale and working conditions slip away—it will be too late to scream then!

Christmas is Beautiful—let it be the blessing of our fellow brothers and sisters and not the downfall of them. This year a lot of families may not be able to enjoy Christmas because purchases of cheap imports put the workers out of jobs!

CAVIL-CADE

by Les Finnegan

—IN MONTREAL, CANADA, the world's first trade union of professional diplomats not only got itself successfully organized, but, more astonishing, actually signed a 39-month collective bargaining agreement with the Canadian government. More than 400 diplomats, representing Canada in 85 foreign countries, ratified a contract calling for a 20% pay increase over three years—with overtime provisions, yet! The two-year-old union, the Professional Association of Foreign Service Officers, actually retains the right to strike but relinquished it as a practical matter in return for major government concessions. One of these was overtime pay for Saturdays, Sundays and holidays. Only Ambassadors aren't eligible for the union and its benefits; they're considered part of management.

—IN LONDON, ENGLAND, the National Union of Seamen signed a new contract that will bring its members all the comforts of home—or at least one important comfort. Wives, the agreement specifies, may now voyage with their seafaring husbands. There are not many restrictions. The merchant seamen must first work 24 months for the company; they must be 23 years of age or more and their wives must be at least 21. And finally, the agreement provides that the wives may spend a total of 65 days a year on the high seas with their husbands. Said one union official, "we've finally realized that age-old sailor's dream of a wife in every port—but we never guessed we'd get it this way!"

—In Washington, D.C., a business magazine found that President Nixon has equalled President Eisenhower in surrounding himself with an affluent society. Of the 12 members of Nixon's cabinet, the magazine found, nine are millionaires.

—In Sacramento, Calif., if you don't think that big business discriminates against women, you have a shock coming, in a study recently completed by the School of Business Administration of Sacramento State College. The study covering 71 industrial corporate giants listed among the top 100 in assets in 1945 and 1967 said the report: "Out of 1300 executives—chairman of boards, presidents, and vice presidents—we could not find one woman listed."

—In Kilmarnock, Scotland, union members responding to a dry summer, agreed to have their tap water cut off for 18 hours each day. They made their sacrifice for the local Scotch Whisky Industry. "But we will have to drink something," said a union spokesman. "We expect the company to recognize this and provide the necessary liquid."

—In Tel Aviv, Israel, Histadrut, the General Federation of Labor, could easily claim, if it wanted, to be the world's most democratic labor movement. Eleven political parties had candidates in the National Histadrut elections.

—In Portsmouth, England, the world's oldest democratic labor movement started to catch up with the American labor movement. Two thousand delegates to the convention of the British Trades Union Congress (representing 8,500,000) voted for equal pay for women.

—In Washington, D.C., the American Federation of Teachers doesn't have the word "International" in its name but it's undoubtedly the most international of all AFL-CIO unions. The AFT now has units on Wake Island and Guam, in England, Spain, the Philippines, Italy, the Virgin Islands, Germany, the Netherlands, Turkey and Japan. How come? AFT members teach the children of U. S. civilians and members of the armed forces abroad.

Hook It Up!

New ally in the campaign to cut military spending

When a pillar of the business establishment like Fortune Magazine argues that defense expenditures (now $80 billion a year) are too high and should be slashed, that makes news of the "man bites dog" variety. Fortune's position is spelled out in an article entitled "The Case for Cutting Defense Spending" and in an editorial entitled "It's Time to Audit the Defense Department."

Both are carried in the Aug. 1 issue of Fortune and have caused wide repercussions on Capitol Hill where senators like William Proxmire (D., Wis.) and others have been battling for cuts in military outlays. Proxmire and other senators hailed the magazine's analysis on the senate floor.

The Fortune article declares that the defense structure has grown like topsy "in the absence of a clearly stated national security policy laid down by the White House."

"Furthermore, under pressures of the Vietnam war, civilian control over military spending has diminished, efficiency has decreased, and a large amount of 'gold plating' of the forces has taken place under the guise of meeting the needs of the war," the article adds. "Unless brought under control, these trends can easily drive the defense budget to more than $100 billion within a few years. . . ." It should be slashed to $61 billion, the magazine said.

Fortune spells out suggested cuts to reach that level. These include a cutback of the 800,000 military men; cuts in naval ships and Air Force tactical squadrons added since the Vietnam buildup in 1965; slashes in forces deployed in Europe and Asia; "a paring down of weapons systems of low cost effectiveness," greater overall efficiency in use of manpower, "a crackdown on wasteful procurement of new weapons," and various other reductions.

"After the proposed cuts. the U.S. would still have the most powerful and diversified military force in the world," Fortune asserts. It adds that this figure could be further reduced if the ABM is not deployed and if disarmament talks with Soviet Russia succeed, or it could be increased if Russia accelerates its defense buildup.

The Fortune editorial backstopping the article warns that "the U.S. is in the grip of a costly, escalating pattern of military expenditure that could well keep rising even after Vietnam." It declares a reassessment of the nation's defense structure is "urgently needed" and says the Nixon Administration has begun such a review.

"At a staggering cost the military has repeatedly bought weapons and deployed forces in ways that have added only marginally to national security," according to Fortune. "Moreover, in the procurement of new weapons, both the military and its corporate suppliers have been guilty of wasteful practices. . . ."

The editorial endorses suggestions contained in the article that the defense budget, after the Vietnam war, "could immediately be cut by more than 20 per cent, to about $61 billion, without compromising either the nation's security or its present commitments.

Also, the editorial calls for a complete reappraisal of U.S. military policy and structure so as to bring about "a balance between military needs and the other priorities." The editorial concludes that "in redefining the goals of the military and its place in the governmental structure and in society, Congress and the Administration have a chance to exert a profoundly constructive influence on the character of American life in the 1970s. They should seize the opportunity." We heartily agree.—Labor.

WASHINGTON (PAI)—Back in 1913 it took a manufacturing production worker over 22 hours to earn $5 compared with 1 hour and 40 minutes in 1968.

But here's the difference between what that $5 will purchase in the market place, then and now:

What $5 bought in 1913

3 lbs. Round Steak	$0.67
2 lbs. Cheese	.44
10 lbs. Flour	.33
2 lbs. Rice	.17
2 Loaves of Bread	.11
5 lbs. Chuck Roast	.80
2 lbs. Sliced Bacon	.54
4 qts. Milk	.35
1 lb. Butter	.38
15 lbs. Potatoes	.26
5 lbs. Sugar	.28
1 doz. Eggs	.35
1 lb. Coffee	.30

Plus 2¢ left over for candy

What $5 bought in 1968

2 lbs. 13 oz. Round Steak	$3.22
2 lbs. Cheese	1.78
	$5.00

All this is spelled out in a handy desk reference on labor statistics issued by the Labor Department's Bureau of Labor Statistics, "The Handbook of Labor Statistics, 1969."

Trying to start a fire or something?

Every Administration has its own tone and the Nixon Administration after a slow start has taken on its own coloration—conservative-business-banking.

For a time it appeared that Nixon had no hard and fast domestic program all ready to put into effect despite the fact that he had been running for the Presidency for 20 years and presumably had worked out his answers to most of the nation's problems. He created numerous councils and committees to advise him on the issues and even now has appointed a series of Task Forces to advise him on the course that the nation should take in the 70's which lie ahead.

Yet, already he has pretty well charted the course that he wants the nation to take under his Administration.

- The Supreme Court: The President's two nominees, Judges Warren E. Burger and Clement Haynsworth, Jr. clearly come from the conservative wing of the Judiciary, in the Haynsworth case is more than well-documented in the field of labor-management relations and civil rights.

The President himself has made it perfectly clear that he intends to remold the Court in a far more conservative spirit than the Warren Court which aroused so much conservative ire.

- Inflation: The President has surrounded himself with conservative, business-oriented economists and bankers and has readily made the war on inflation a major priority of his Adminstration. Despite soothing reassurances to the contrary to organized labor, jobs are to be sacrificed, are already being sacrificed by cuts in the Federal budget and a deliberate slowing down in the economy.

How far Nixon will go in accepting unemployment remains to be seen, but his closest advisers have warned that as much unemployment will be accepted as is needed to halt inflation. Under the last Republican Administration, that of President Eisenhower, unemployment hit 7.4 percent at one point and was 5.5 percent when Eisenhower left office. It is now 4 percent as compared with 3.3 last January when Nixon took office.

- Budget cuts: As part of his drive on inflation, the President has called for sharp cuts in the Federal budget, military as well as civilian, notably many of the social services. How far the latter cuts are purely budgetary and how far they respond to Republican dislike for many of these services is anyone's guess. There can be little doubt, however, that from the conservative view the two go nicely together.

- States Rights: The Nixon Administration has repeatedly made it clear that it wants the emphasis on many programs to be placed on the States rather than on the Federal Government. It has supported State authority in such fields as industrial safety, training programs for the unemployed; Federal contributions to the States without any strings and a softening of the school integration drive by the Federal Government in the South where State's Rights are a shibboleth.

- Tax Reform: The President avoided the problem of Tax Reform as long as he could eventually coming up with a program of minor reforms and averted eyes for the major ones. When the House came through with a fairly strong reform bill, the President found it too harsh on business. He sought to restore tax benefits and take them away from middle-income taxpayers.

- Labor-Management Relations: The President and Secretary of Labor George P. Shultz have adopted a hands off policy with respect to labor-management conflict, at least for the present. This is something that both labor and management have called for in the past so both sides are satisfied. His refusal to go in for wage price guidelines also has met with favor by both sides. However, both Shultz and Housing Secretary George Romney have clearly sought to by-pass the apprenticeship system in the building and construction trades. As yet, the President has made no appointments to the National Labor Relations Board, long the target of the business community. The kind of appointment he makes will go a long way in establishing his attitude toward NLRB decisions of the past.

Obviously the Nixon Administration is bound to have a great similarity in its general philosphy to that of President Eisenhower. After all, Nixon was Eisenhower's Vice-President for eight years. Nevertheless, there are important differences.

Eisenhower was largely content to let the country continue pretty much along the course that it had been following for many previous years. The Nixon Administration, on the other hand, is far more "activist" and apparently determined to change the nation's domestic course, to fashion it more along the lines of conservative Republican philosphy. To that end, it would turn the clock back.

Union holiday

In White Plains, N. Y., a local of the AFL-CIO Transport Workers Union negotiated a new holiday for local bus drivers. From now on the drivers won't work on Union Membership Day—which will fall each year on the anniversary of the day they joined the union.

"Pretty cute and pretty clever," commented the president of the Central Labor Council, "because obviously you've got to join the union to get the holiday."

Labor Calls for Enactment of Job Health and Safety Standards

In 1968 the Johnson Administration proposed legislation, which for the first time in our history, would mount a national program to reduce the shocking rate of job connected deaths, injuries and illnesses.

This legislation died in the 90th Congress. Consequently the deaths, injuries and illnesses on the job were at the same level in 1968 as in 1967: killed, 14,300; injured, 2.2 million; cost in loss-time, lost production, and insurance totalled about $7.9 billion.

We can expect the same killing and losses on the job in 1969 and 1970 if the 91st Congress fails to enact a comprehensive program of occupational health and safety standards.

Thousands of workers every year die slow, often agonizing deaths from the effects of asbestos, beryllium, carbon monoxide, coal dust, cotton dust, cancer-causing chemicals, dyes, unusual fuels, pesticides, radiation, and other occupational hazards such as heat, noise, or vibration, many without ever knowing the relationship of the disease to their job environments.

State laws and enforcement procedures have done very little to stop the killing of Americans in the work place. According to a fact sheet issued by the Bureau of Labor Standards only four states met the health and safety standards of the American Standards Association. Federal agencies with occupational health and safety responsibilities have also failed to deal adequately with health and safety standards.

The AFL-CIO for many years has urged action on a strong, broad-based federal program to control or eliminate any on-the-job hazards endangering workers' health and safety.

Pending legislation

Two of the several bills currently pending in Congress are worthy of note. One, the O'Hara-Williams bill (H.R. 3809 and S. 2193) is endorsed by the AFL-CIO. The other is the Nixon Administration's Occupational Health and Safety Act of 1969 introduced by Sen. Jacob Javits (R-N.Y.) and Rep. William Ayers (R-Ohio).

Both bills are laudable in their intent—to protect the health and safety of the American worker—and share the following major characteristics:

1. Provide for federal standards in both occupational health and safety.
2. Provide a system of enforcement and penalties, including closing down of unsafe plants and cancellation of federal contracts.
3. Encourage and assist states to develop effective occupational health and safety programs.

The major differences between the bills occurs in five areas, effective date, coverage, standard setting, enforcement, and relationship to other federal programs. In all these crucial areas the O'Hara-Williams bills (H.R. 3809 and S. 2193) present a stronger, more realistic and more comprehensive program of worker health and safety legislation.

The following analysis lists some of the differences between the principal legislation—the proposal of the Nixon Administration (Ayers-Javits bills) and the program endorsed by the AFL-CIO, the O'Hara-Williams bills (in bold face type).

Coverage

AYERS-JAVITS (effective date, July 1, 1972)—Program exempts from coverage federal, state and local employers; employers with 3 or less employees; and an agricultural employer using less than 500 man-days of hired farm labor in a peak quarter.

O'HARA-WILLIAMS (effective date, July 1, 1970)—Bill covers all employers except federal, state and local.

Standards

The safety and health standards will be set by a National Occupational Health and Safety Board. The Board is a five-man independent agency appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate.

The Board is restricted to dealing only with applicable "national consensus standards." Unfortunately the only two organizations issuing such standards are the USA Standards Institute and the National Fire Protection Association. Neither is responsible to the government or to the worker but to the private industries they serve.

The safety and health standards are set by the Secretary of Labor. The Secretary of HEW, after consultation with the Secretary of Labor will undertake programs to produce occupational health criteria to be used by the Secretary of Labor to produce standards.

In setting the standards, the Secretary is under no hampering restrictions. He may use the "consensus" method or he may promulgate his own as he determines necessary to protect workers.

Enforcement

In case of violations of standards or regulations, the Secretary must petition the Board for a hearing, "to determine if a violation has occurred." The Board may then issue an enforcement order. Inspection can only take place after presenting written notice.

No employer will be found in violation if he can prove that he has provided "substantially equal" health and safety provisions to those found in applicable standards under this Act.

If the Secretary opposes an action of the Board with respect to enforcement under this Section he has recourse to the federal District Courts, and is represented by his solicitor, while the Board is represented by the U.S. Attorney General.

If the Secretary determines there is a violation of standards, then he is directed to hold a hearing and issue necessary orders to enforce. An aggrieved person has recourse in the federal courts.

There is a penalty provision against advance warning of an inspection.

Profit problem

NEW YORK (PAI)—Officials of General Electric, for once, were unhappy about reporting expanding profits—up a whopping 11 percent the third quarter of the year.

It makes it awfully difficult for GE to cry "poverty" in its critical negotiations with 11 unions. The big IUE contract expires October 26.

Imminent danger situation

The Secretary may petition a federal court for an injunction or temporary restraining order. The restraining order is good for only five days, after which he may petition the court for an injunction. This injunction is only good until such time as the Board holds a hearing "to determine if a violation has occurred." The Board then determines the action that shall be taken.

The Secretary may issue an abatement order without a prior hearing, the order remaining in effect during a subsequent hearing on the order.

Relationship to other federal programs

Prohibits the Secretary from regulating working conditions of an employee in an industry where any other federal agency regulates such conditions by statute.

Provides that the Secretary can use the procedures of this Act to regulate the health and safety in an industry already covered by existing federal regulations, by rescinding them and bringing them under the terms of this Act alone.

Effective administration of the Nixon program is hampered by the "extra layer" of bureaucracy. The effect of the Board is to hamstring vigorous and effective administration of the law by the Secretaries of Labor and HEW. In addition, the standards are not set by the government but by private organizations who are primarily concerned with being responsive to their private business clients.

The AFL-CIO has concluded that the O'Hara-Williams bills (H.R. 3809 and S. 2193) provide a superior program of worker health and safety. Union members are urged to write their Congressmen requesting their support of the O'Hara-Williams bills.

Drive Carefully

With the coming of winter, driving becomes more hazardous and the need for extra care becomes vital. A few facts from the Auto Dealers Traffic Safety Council, Washington, D.C. may be of interest to those who wanted to contribute in an effort toward accident prevention.

- A total of 55,200 persons lost their lives in motor vehicle accidents in 1968—an increase of 4 per cent over 1967.
- Some 2,000,000 were disabled beyond the day of the accident during the year.
- The economic loss due to motor vehicle accidents is estimated at more than $11 billion.
- Figures show that 93 per cent (more than nine out of ten) accidents happen in the driver's own state and 79 per cent (nearly four out of five) happen locally or within 25 miles of the drivers home.
- Almost 7 out of 10 crash deaths last year occurred in rural areas.
- More than one-half of all crash deaths occurred in night accidents.
- Improper driving was a factor in 80.3 per cent (eight out of ten) of all fatal accidents.
- Too much speed for conditions of road or traffic was blamed for three out of ten accidents.
- Alcohol was involved in at least half of all fatal auto accidents.
- The top ten states in motor vehicle fatalities were: California—4,853; Texas—3,481; New York—3,081; Ohio—2,550; Illinois—2,499; Pennsylvania—2,410; Michigan—2,388; Florida—2,100; Georgia—1,778 and Indiana—1,519.

Unity essential for social progress

ATLANTIC CITY, N.J., (PAI)—Benjamin Franklin's warning to his comrades of the American Revolution that they would all hang separately if they did not hang together, was given a 1969 version by Michael Harrington, widely known writer on American poverty to the International Labor Press Convention here.

Harrington warned against the polarization of antagonisms between the poor and the ex-poor, the organized and the unorganized and the whites and the blacks, reaching the conclusion:

"If labor and Negroes do not get together, both will be defeated," he declared.

In his talk, which wound up the ILPA Convention, Harrington said that the great hope of the future was the unity of American workers and declared that the Labor Press could play a vital role in achieving that unity.

Harrington said that the United States today "has the wrong President, is getting the wrong Supreme Court and next year may get the wrong Congress," at a time when the nation is facing great difficulties which have been accentuated by the Vietnam war.

The writer, whose book "The Other America" shocked the country when it was published, said that it was a mistake to separate the United States into the poor and the rich; that more than half of the American population does not have the "modest but adequate" income set by government standards and that at least a third are badly housed.

As a result, he said, American social legislation should be designed not merely for a segment of the population but for all workers. All Americans, he said, have common goals, and should work together to achieve them.

In this struggle, he declared, "there can be no social progress without the labor movement, which in turn must have the support of all workers."

Harrington also made a plea for greater understanding of the American youth movement, which, he said, was not represented by a small radical minority which engaged in violence and defiance of society. Rather, he declared, there were many millions of young Americans in the colleges and universities who were inspired by high motives.

Finally, he declared, organized labor must fight for the real right to work," that is, jobs for all Americans. He also warned against the "old reactionary" trick of pitting white and Negro workers against each other.

Jump in living costs cuts workers' buying power

Washington—The buying power of workers' paychecks was below year ago levels for the ninth consecutive month in October as the cost of living continued to soar higher, the Labor Dept. reported.

A four-tenths of 1 percent jump in living costs sent the Consumer Price Index to 129.8. That means it cost $12.98 in October to buy goods and services that cost $10 in the 1957-59 base period.

The October rise was smaller than the five-tenths of 1 percent increase in September and a similar one in July, but identical to the increase in August.

On the earnings side, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported that gross average weekly earnings of production and non-supervisory workers fell by 86 cents between September and October to $116.94.

The decrease, BLS said, was due to a four-tenths of an hour reduction in weekly hours, which more than offset a 1-cent gain in hourly earnings.

Merger proposal approved by Elizabeth 99 and North Jersey 31

The merger bandwagon continued to roll in Northern New Jersey last month with Elizabeth (N.J.) Local 99 electing to join forces with North Jersey Pressmen's Union No. 31.

Local 99 is the fourth union to affiliate with No. 31 in the past three years, the others being Locals 34, 94 and 442. North Jersey Pressmen now have jurisdiction over an area extending from Newark to the Northern tip of the state and down to the Pennsylvania border.

Talks between the officers of the locals had been carried on for some time with the thought that better wages, hours and working conditions could be achieved if the two organizations were one. President Raymond Thompson, Vice-President Peter Ortuso, Treasurer Peter Gega and Secretary Jack Shields represented Local 99, and Secretary-Treasurer William Faulkner and Director of Organization Sam Kaspar spoke for No. 31 during the negotiations.

The officers were rewarded for their efforts when the memberships of both unions voted approval of the merger proposal and sanction was unanimously voted by the International Board of Directors.

A warm and cordial welcome was given No. 99 members when they attended their first regular monthly meeting in November. Officers of No. 31 expressed pride in the merger achievement and voiced confidence that the "new members will surely reap the rewards of the seed they have sown."

Secretary-Treasurer Faulkner expressed appreciation to International Vice-President Sol Fishko for his guidance and advice on merger procedures, and "for the time he devoted to further the area of understanding by which the merger was consummated."

International Representative William Torrence was cited by Director of Organization Kaspar as a "source of information, advice, and direction, and for his appearances to bridge the scope of these mergers when frequent meetings between the locals were not possible due to prior commitments."

In other Local news: the recent death of Frank Nilan, the first president of Newark Press Assistants' Union 19, brought to mind the early trade union struggles of the Twenties. Brother Nilan, who worked at the old Osborne Co., will be missed by his compatriots. His son, John, is an active member of No. 31 and is employed by the Prudential Insurance Co.

Tom Klasko, Clarkwood Corp. chapel chairman and a dedicated Scoutmaster, is currently presenting a program on graphic arts education to a group of Scouts. The boys expressed an interest in printing when they learned of Brother Klasko's trade.

Patrick Blacer, Glen Davis, Terrence

Army veteran Robert Kerr an active member of Local 31, recently returned to his job at Clarkwood Corp, after seeing action in Vietnam.

Hall, George Kalian and Anthony Palmeri have been welcomed as new members of the local.

Many of the candidates backed by labor in the recent New Jersey elections were defeated at the polls. However, the state AFL-CIO, in a never say we are out manner, is taking a positive stance by keeping all unions informed as to the voting records of local and state officials.

In keeping with the Holiday tradition and for the the sake of members' families, Local 31 urges union members to set the example for the Holidays by making it a safe one, both on and off the job, through the New Year.

Atlanta No. 527 negotiates master contract with five printing firms

They said it was impossible to negotiate a master agreement with three different companies at the same time.

Atlanta (Ga.) Printing Specialties and Paper Products Local 527 did one better and negotiated agreements with three companies at the same time and negotiated essentially the same agreement with two other companies.

For a number of years, the officers of Local 527 have been trying to improve the contracts of Foote & Davies (a division of McCall Printing), Ruralist Press, Dittler Brothers, Curtiss Printing and Superior Printing.

Three years ago, Local 527 President Ralph M. Meers met with the members from these five companies to establish their goals and determine the methods to obtain them.

The members made tremendous gains at that time by establishing additional classifications, adding much desired language, and negotiating substantial wage adjustments, but to the leadership as well as the members these gains were not enough.

Atlanta Local 527's negotiating committee (Foote & Davies) are Benny Hickey (left), Henry Crawford, President Meers, Thomas Bailey, Luther Young and Willie Gilbert.

Reviewing details of the Dittler Brothers, Ruralist Press and Curtis Printing master agreement are negotiating committee members Willie Surry, James Willis, President Meers, Joe Bray and Harold Banks.

In early 1969, President Meers started laying the ground work for future negotiations with these five companies.

Finally, after many hurdles were overcome, he was able to persuade the five companies to agree to negotiate a master contract with Local 527.

The officers and the negotiating committee then spent a total of 37 days in negotiations with the companies, sometimes working long hours into the night.

As a last resort they were to use strike action granted by the International Union. But with determination and strike sanction, they were able to obtain a satisfactory agreement.

The three-year master contract calls for wage increases from 30¢ to 55¢ across-the-board the first year, 23¢ per hour the second year and 32¢ per hour the third year.

Other benefits include: 4 weeks vacation after 17 years service (members already enjoyed 2 weeks for 1 year and 3 weeks for 4 years); nine paid holidays; a 37½ hour work week; 7½ hour day; 7½ hours reporting pay; double time after 10½ hours; double time after 7½ hours on Saturday; triple time after 7½ hours on Sunday; and triple time for holidays worked.

In addition to the above improvements, Local 527's negotiating committee also gained: a shift differential of 12¢ for second shift employees and 20¢ for the third shift crew; a cost-of-living clause; and an instant arbitration clause.

The company will also pay the total cost of the improved insurance program, including major medical; $5,000 life insurance; $75 per week accident and sickness insurance; and $26 per day room and board while in the hospital.

Correspondent Charles Mattingly, expressing his opinion on this great achievement noted, "yes, some felt it was impossible to obtain but with much determination and support not only from the membership of Local 527, but from the Board of Directors of the International Union as well, we were able to obtain the kind of agreement we were able to live with for the next three years. The members employed at the five plants are justifiably proud of their local union."

Hoosier District Joint Council plans seminar

The bi-monthly meeting of the Hoosier District Joint Council was held at the Antelope Club, in Indianapolis, on Saturday, October 11, 1969. The meeting, called to order by President Martin Pickell, was attended by 24 delegates and guests representing 10 locals. Also in attendance were two International organizers, Paul Graham and Walter Abel, and special guest Walter Allen, Director of the Department of Education and Information of the International Union.

The regular business of the Council was conducted in the morning session along with Business Agent Donald Montague's activity report. In the afternoon Walter Allen led a discussion on the need for continuing educational programs at the Council and local union level. He discussed the possibility of the International Union scheduling a week-end educational seminar in cooperation with the Council to be held in late Winter or early Spring of 1970. Delegates offered their opinions and suggestions and a committee was appointed to make definite plans for such a seminar.

This meeting concluded with the financial report by Secretary-Treasurer Gale Weaver.

Local 415 Chicago Organizes 2 plants

Western Kraft Corporation and Colbert Packaging Corporation are now organized and under contract to Printing Specialties Local 415.

The Western Kraft plant located in Melrose Park has a present work force numbering about thirty people. Local 415 has two other Western Kraft plants under contract. One in Montgomery and the other one in Elk Grove Village. All three plants manufacture Corrugated Containers.

Colbert Packaging Corporation recently purchased Franklin Folding Box of Melrose Park and is moving its production facilities to the Melrose Park plant. The firm's 75 employees will join some 30 Franklin workers who have been members of Local 415 for a number of years.

As reported by Organizers Walter Rebenson and John Rizzo union representation in both plants was achieved through a card check by impartial parties, as joining our union produced overwhelming employee interest which was accepted by both employers as sufficient evidence in preference to the usual lengthy Labor Board procedure of certification.

These new members are now enjoying better wages and benefits consistent with those already attained in other 415 plants.

The Western Kraft campaign was spearheaded by Vice-President Harold Koons who also negotiated the terms of the contract.

In the Colbert Packaging campaign we had the able assistance of 415s President Tom Cohoon and Recording-Secretary Edward Piontek, who also negotiated the terms of the contract.

On behalf of our Local and International officers, and our memberships, we welcome our new brother and sister members into our growing ranks.

Specialty Local 415, Chicago, Ill., organizes Western Kraft Corporations plant at Melrose Park, Ill.

Lewis Lacy, Shop Chairman and Glenn Singletary, Production Manager Western Kraft bind agreement with handshake.

With the approach of winter in Chicago, our method to reach the unorganized will change to more house calls after the initial plant handbill. This is the basic key to all organization, and in the main is used when a representation election is in the offing.

In future editions we expect to report additional progress in organization.

Raffle and guest speaker draws over 250 to meeting

A drive by Chicago (Ill.) Commercial Pressmen's Local No. 3 to get a larger membership turnout at their regular meetings has thus far proved successful.

No. 3's November newsletter announced a $65 raffle (which would buy a lot of Thanksgiving turkey) and special guest speaker Senator Alan Dixon, Senate Democratic Whip in the Illinois State Legislature.

Senator Dixon has had an excellent pro-labor record and recently sponsored an anti-strikebreaker bill.

Henry F. Coco, Secretary of the Chicago Allied Printing Trades Council, introduced the Senator.

The combination of the raffle and special speaker resulted in a turnout of more than 250 members. (Other locals with poor attendance records at their meeting, take note.)

On the organizing front, Local 3 has prepared a flyer which points out the increasing tax burden on wage earners and the obvious need for a strong union to protect the workers' interests.

$45 per week increase gained

Printing Pressmen, Assistants and Offset Workers' Union No. 4 of Philadelphia, Penna. signed the best contract negotiated this year by any Graphic Arts Union in this city when it completed negotiations with the Pennland Printing Company of Yeadon, Pa.

The contract is for three years and calls for a $15.00 per week increase on November 1, 1969 and $15.00 per week on the anniversary date of each of the succeeding years.

A reduction in hours to 37 hours first shift, 36½-2nd shift, and 35 hours-3rd shift.

Paid leave for Bereavement time, Jury duty and National Guard Service.

Improved Life Insurance and S & A insurance as well as Blue Cross-Blue Shield coverage; which will be determined by improvement made in industry wide bargaining coming up in the City of Philadelphia.

Time and one half for work during lunch time and an additional lunch period for overtime work of two to four hours and a third paid lunch for overtime of five or more hours.

Also included in the Contract is 10 paid holidays as well as four weeks vacation after 1 years service.

The Negotiation Committee consisted of Bill Given of Pennland Printing Company, Fred Day, Business Manager of Local No. 4 and International Representative Joseph Mahon.

Isador Schwartz 'dean' of Gazette's employees

Isador Schwartz, presently enjoying 52 years of membership with Albany (N.Y.) Local 23, was honored recently by his employer, the Schenectady Gazette.

Brother Schwartz has logged 54 years of continuous service with the newspaper and is still in its employ as a pressman.

In the Gazette's October 2 issue, an article was featured labelling Schwartz as "dean" of the 25 Gazette employees who have totalled up 25 years or more of service.

In part, the article reads, "on this 75th Anniversary of its founding, the Gazette takes pride in doffing its masthead to this loyal group of quarter century employees."

Besides Brother Schwartz, the veteran employees honored also included other Local 23 members, as well as those from various departments throughout the Gazette.

Henry T. Chambers dies

Henry T. Chambers, passed away October 15 at age 69. He had held all offices in the Gulf Coast (Tex.) Offset Workers, Printing Pressmen and Assistants' Union No. 71, in addition to holding his membership in good standing since 1924.

Brother Chambers worked in almost all parts of the printing trade during his active life, and for the past 30 years a rotary pressroom foreman at Gulf Printing Company.

In addition to being a long-time member of Local 71, he was also a Charter member of Houston Newspaper Local 43.

Brother Chambers served in World War I and worked in amateur baseball before the Little League teams were organized. His other hobbies included hunting, fishing and golf even after losing a leg in an automobile accident in 1935.

In commenting on Brother Chambers' death, Local 71 Secretary-Treasurer Dove says, "the men who worked under him admired and respected him as a strong union member. Organized labor and Local 71 have lost a valuable person and a friend."

Brother Chambers' survivors include his wife, a son and two sisters.

Local 564 agrees to three-year contract

An agreement between Three-Rivers (Que.) Printing Pressmen and Assistants' Union No. 564 and the newspaper Le Nouvelliste was recently signed with wage increases to the amount of $26.25 per week over the three year period. The first years increase of $13.12 took effect April 21, 1969.

Other benefits gained include an improvement in the overtime clauses (double time introduced) and the addition of one extra holiday for a total of nine (employee's birthday).

Local 564 members also achieved improved insurance benefits; four weeks vacation allowed on a graduation basis; and an improvement in the apprentice wage scale, up to 90%.

Récemment une nouvelle convention collective de travail a été conclue entre la Three-Rivers Printing Pressmen, Local 564 et Le Nouvelliste (1967) Ltée.

Parmi les principales améliorations apportées à l'ancienne convention, on note une augmentation du taux horaire de .70 répartis comme suit: .35 pour la première année; .15 la deuxième année; troisième année premier six mois: .10 et deuxième six mois: .10. Un .25 additionnel est ajouté pour ceux qui travaillent sur l'équipe de nuit.

Une fête statutaire à été ajoutée pour porter le nombre à neuf. Vacances: 2 semaines après un an de service; 3 semaines après 8 ans et 1 mois après 24 ans (première fois). Si un employé doit s'absenter pour être membre d'un juré, il reçoit son plein salaire. L'échelle d'apprentissage a été sensiblement améliorée; ainsi que les bénéfices d'assurance-groupe et assurance-salaire.

Present for the signing of No. 564's new three-year agreement are Bernard Prudhomme (seated left), company lawyer; Eric Ferrat, company president; Roland Rioux, union president; and Daniel Gilligan, union representative.

Second row: Gilles St-Arnaud, company secretary-treasurer; Jean-Guy Bissonnette, company production manager; Albert Dubois, foreman; Jules Bergeron, foreman; Jacques Page, union negotiator; Antoine Murray, union secretary-treasurer; and Roland Lefebvre, union negotiator.

'Curley' F. Stevens dies, former International Representive

Kenneth F. Stevens, long-time member of Seattle (Wash.) Newspaper Local No. 26, died October 2.

Known to the membership as "Curley," he retired in 1961 but often returned to fill out a pressroom crew.

His career in the printing industry started in Seattle and, after serving in World War I, he went on to work in Boston for a short time.

Upon returning to Seattle, Brother Stevens was employed by the Star until it closed down, going to work for a while at the Times and Herald.

Over the years he held such offices as president, one term; secretary, five years; and as vice-president.

In addition to being a member of the scale committee for many years and a member of the executive board, "Curley" was also an International representative for the Seattle area under the late International President George L. Berry.

Kenneth F. Stevens

Editor's note: It was my privilege to have had Kenneth F. Stevens as a friend since 1940. Curley, served the Pacific Northwest as an International representative in the early 40's. This was at the time that Specialty Local 380 was organizing and expanding.

Curley gave freely of his time and talent when called upon by Local 380 officers. Because of his vast knowledge of the labor movement, understanding of people and calm collected manner he was at his best when the situation became most difficult.

He was a fine gentleman, a dedicated trade unionist and a wonderful friend who will be greatly missed by all.—Thomas W. Smith

Increase in unemployment

OTTAWA (CPA)—Between September and October unemployment increased by 35,000 to 314,000 across Canada.

Quebec (11,000) and the Prairies (10,000) showed the largest regional increases.

The total unemployment is up 26,000 over a year ago. The jobless rate, seasonally adjusted, was 5.3 percent.

The labor force in October was 8,142,000, up 147,000 or 1.8 percent in the year. Employment increased by 12,000, or 1.6 per cent.

Farm employment was down 29,000 compared with 1968.

The big increases in employment occurred in community, business and personal services, up by 76,000.

Correction

The November issue of News and Views featured an article on Shamokin (Pa.) Local 726's cost-of-living hike.

An eight percent figure was given as the proposed new rate—it should have read an eight cents per hour increase.

Western Graphic Arts Union No. 14 devotes meeting to contract proposals

The primary purpose of the second general meeting of Western Graphic Arts Union No. 14, held in San Francisco on October 11, was to open up and expand communications between those elected to the negotiating committee and the members.

Most members had to travel at least 20 miles, while some came from as far away as 180 miles, to make their wishes known regarding the goals for upcoming contract negotiations. The agreement expires on March 1, 1970.

Business Representative Nick Pavletich said the emphasis was placed on obtaining members views on contract proposals at this early stage in order to avoid a 1970 contract rejection arising out of emphasing the wrong items at the bargaining table.

The local recognized the cause of many rejected contracts as a breakdown in communications and is seeking to overcome this obstacle on the West Coast.

This all began last May, when the bargaining priorities of each and every member was solicited through a checklist questionnaire. Each member was asked to select what he considered to be the five most important items and the selections were then returned to the local's office.

From that beginning in May and throughout the following months, No. 14's discussions have centered on contract proposals, the need for one master agreement, one health and welfare plan, and a continuation of merger of all benefits.

It also became apparent that there was a need for one dues structure (there are presently eight) based on the ability to pay.

The Scale Committee stated their positions on certain issues at the meeting, as well as the members bringing forth more than 30 suggested changes.

From this list, the following 10 items received the most support:

- the committee not consider recommending any agreement of over one year, if a cost-of-living clause is not included;
- the employers be advised that the union's position is one of having a signed agreement on the termination date of the current agreement;
- the committee adopt one proposal and negotiate only one craft contract for the Bay Area, specifically combining the San Jose, San Francisco and Oakland contracts;
- the health and welfare contributions be to one fund only and that the coverage be standardized throughout the jurisdiction;
- the pension contributions be based on a percentage of wages;
- the percentage for vacation pay be increased;
- all "letters of understanding" and other side agreements be cancelled or incorporated in the contract language;
- an apprenticeship, training and automation fund be established and supported by an hourly contribution;
- a clause that guarantees present employees to the first option on new equipment or processes; and
- that the present sick leave clause be improved.

The other items suggested by the membership dealt directly with money and classifications, which will be considered by the Scale Committee and included in the new proposal.

Brother Pavletich also stated, "the meeting was a fine conclusion to a long search for the proper development of contract proposals."

In other business: The membership confirmed the appointments of the Scale Committee; swore in eight new members; and talked of new shops being organized.

District Council S7 organizes 3 plants

Southeastern Printing Specialties and Paper Products District Council No. 7 has successfully completed three campaigns in which it has been involved for several months.

Members of Greenville (Tenn.) Local 753 have completed negotiations and signed a one-year contract with National Business Forms, Inc. The firm's employees fought long and hard for the contract, spending some nine months on the picket line to back up their demands for recognition and reasonable terms.

During the long strike the company was found guilty of unfair labor practices by the National Labor Relations Board. Management is appealing the decision to the 6th Circuit Court in Cincinnati.

A successful organizing drive at the Swainsboro (Ga.) Printing and Finishing Co., a cloth printing firm, has been concluded with the chartering of Specialty Local 760 and the signing of a one-year first-time contract. James Grant has been elected president and Harry L. Jones secretary-treasurer of the 125-member local.

Negotiations for a first-time contract covering approximately 50 employees of Oak Folding Carton Co. at Elon College, N.C., have been successfully concluded by Greensboro (N.C.) Local 465 and S7 representatives. The three-year agreement provides for a wage reopener in the third year.

"In the first half of the year, the buying power of per capita after-tax personal income of all people in the country was only slightly greater than in the final quarter of 1968.

"Unemployment started to inch up, from 3.3 per cent in January and February to 3.6 per cent in July."

As we got into the second half of the year there was a growing danger of rising unemployment. Since the report was written our rate did go to the 4 per cent level and then recently eased back to 3.9 per cent. But unemployment is looked upon by many in the business community as a necessity to fight inflation. As the report notes, ". . . there were statements by business spokesmen that a substantial rise of unemployment was required to achieve price stability."

We would fully agree with the report's comment which says, "The misguided notion that there is an inevitable, mechanical trade-off between inflation and unemployment . . . is loaded with social dynamite. Advocates of this Neanderthal view have never explained how a million additional unemployed can possibly reduce such price pressures as rising physicians' fees, hospital charges and land prices which have been among the sharpest price boosts in the past decade."

The Government has a series of restrictive policies and these—especially the tight money and high interest rates—contribute to high living costs. These policies have contributed to reduced housing construction and threaten to increase unemployment and bring on a recession. But these policies have not stopped inflation. We should add that the recent order of the President to cut back Government construction by 75 per cent has contributed to the restrictive program with its concurrent evils.

The report points out that the real inflationary demand-pressure has come from rapidly rising business investment. There has been a capital goods boom which has rested on the skyrocketing upflow of cash to corporations during the expansion of the past few years. Moreover, Government has made the boom attractive by adoption of a 7 per cent tax credit for investment, a speed-up in depreciation write-offs, continuation of many tax loopholes, business borrowing power at lower rates than are available to the general citizen, etc. These are ways the big business community can expand and profit while the working people suffer increasing living costs.

The AFL-CIO is quite right in calling the pro-business policies wrong. And it makes some constructive suggestions. What are some of the things that should be done? The report notes several:

- The surtax rate on corporate profits should be double that on personal income taxes;
- The income tax credit of 7 per cent should be repealed.
- The fast write-off should be reexamined and revised and repealed except for low- and moderate-income housing.
- The pricing policies and financial operations of our dominant corporations should come under the public scrutiny.
- A congressional review should be made of the nation's monetary machinery and policies.
- Investigation should be made of the specific causes of such price pressures as doctors' fees, hospital charges, auto and property insurance rates and housing costs.
- Manpower training programs should be expanded.

The report reminds union members that if the situation warrants overall stabilization restraints, labor will cooperate, but only on the basis of equality of sacrifice. We will do our part, but we will not be sacrificial lambs. And that we think is sound doctrine. At any time.

No. 51 acquires medical coverage for entire family

Through the efforts of New York Local 51 President William T. Cernera and Secretary-Treasurer Edward Hughes, members will enjoy coverage for their entire families under the local's expanded major medical plan, starting January 1970.

Brothers Cernera and Hughes, Trustees of the Pension and Welfare System, felt with the ever increasing cost of medical care something had to be done.

The plan, which in the past only covered No. 51's members, now provides major medical care for their wives, children up to age 19, and for any children up to age 23, who are attending college.

This improvement was acquired at no additional cost to the membership, while relieving them of tremendous responsibilities.

Recording Secretary Bernard DeSiano states, "the present administration feels this to be the most important and necessary need in order to ward off personal financial hardship on its members and unforeseen emergencies which can occur at any given time."

"Local 51 will continue in its efforts to seek out better benefits that will aid our members so that they may continue to enjoy the fruits of their labor and feel secure in the knowledge that their officers will continue forging ahead for better goals whether they be social or financial."

Four New Jersey area locals merge

Following the recent trend toward mergers among smaller locals in the nation, and after many months of negotiations, the Newark (N. J.) Newspaper Printing Pressmen's Union Local 8, has combined with three other locals.

Becoming part of No. 8 are Middlesex County Printing Pressmen & Assistants' Union No. 442, Paterson Local No. 60, and Elizabeth Local No. 99.

Prior to the merger, Local 8 supplied pressmen to the Newark Evening News and the Star-Ledger, the Morristown Daily Record and the Montclair Times. New additions will be the Perth Amboy News-Tribune, the Paterson Morning News and Evening News, the Herald-News of Passaic-Clifton, the Plainfield Courier and Wayne Today.

Jack T. Higgins, in commenting on the merger, says, "In addition to the obvious feature of increased bargaining strength, the merger has aroused new interest in the affairs of Local 8, as reflected in the 24 members who were nominated at the November meeting to run for the 14 official positions in the local.

In other news from No. 8:

The annual dinner-dance was held on October 26. International Vice-Presidents J. Frazier Moore and Sol Fishko were among the many in attendance.

Seattle Local 26 in second year of contract

Seattle (Wash.) Newspaper Local No. 26 started the second year of their contract on October 1, with $9 per week increase in scale wages bringing them to $181 and $187 for day and night shifts, respectively.

Other benefits that go into effect include three weeks vacation after one year and four weeks after five years, in addition to improvements in the pension, and health and welfare funds.

At the signing of the one-year agreement were Rene Maurice (seated left), company's technical advisor; Jean Bart, shop steward and negotiating committee chairman; Marc Fortin, company president; Victor Volpe, secretary-treasurer and business agent of No. 521.

Standing: Renaud Morin, company treasurer; and Yvon Thibault, negotiating committee member. (Not included in photograph are Jacques Desjardins, negotiating committee member; and Charles Cliche, company attorney.)

Montreal Specialty Local 521 signs first-time contract

A first-time labor agreement was signed in October by Montreal Specialty Local 521 and l'Imprimerie St-Jerome, Inc., providing for an immediate increase of five percent and an additional five percent increase in six months.

The one-year contract also calls for an apprenticeship scale that will permit a more equitable scale of wages for all apprentices while in training.

These employees have also obtained numerous other advantages including union security and three weeks of vacation after eight years of service.

La direction et les employés de l'Imprimerie St-Jérôme Inc. ont signé, la semaine dernière, leur première convention collective de travail. Le nouveau contrat accorde à tout le personnel de cette enterprise jérômienne une augmentation immédiate des salaries de 5 pour cent, et une autre majoration de 5 pour cent dans six mois; une échelle de salaires dans les différents métiers de l'imprimerie a été dressée, ce qui a permis d'établir une equilibre et une rémunération plus juste parmi le personnel. Les employés obtiennent de nombreaux autres avantages comme la sécurité syndicale, trois semaines de vacances après huit ans de service.

Paul E. Thomson retires after 48 years

In 1921, 48 years ago, Paul E. Thomson started his pressroom career in Mobile, Ala., Printing Pressmen Local 100. After serving his apprenticeship he moved to the Birmingham News Co. where he has worked the last 42 years.

In the retirement party given him by brother members of Newspaper Printing Pressmen's Local 55, Paul talked of the open road, fishing lakes, and a long time dream of attending the running of the Kentucky Derby. His coworkers and union brothers presented him with gifts and money at the party.

No. 6 newspaper pressman gets Bronze Star

A junior member of Washington (D. C.) Web Newspaper Local No. 6 and the holder of two citations and medals, Joseph V. Palmer received the Bronze Star July 9 in Vietnam for "meritorious achievement in ground operations against hostile forces."

Brother Palmer's father, Lawrence, says Joe loves the newspaper business and he looks forward to what he fought for—freedom and a need for purpose.

Local 6's Pete Maschi commented, "in short, he has added up to a boy that all of us in the local are very proud of and glad that he is a part of us."

Brother Palmer is presently in Hawaii and hopes to be united with his family at Christmas.

Metric System Changover Poses Problems

The decade of the 70's will be one of change—change in almost every aspect of American society. Most of the, changes, many of which we cannot foresee, will have an impact on American labor and industry. Among the changes which will come a step nearer reality—if indeed it does not become in the next decade—is the adoption of the metric system of weights and measures.

Great Britain has announced plans to switch to the metric system from the traditional foot-pound-quart system and the British graphic arts industry is making the changeover in December, 1970. The impact on the graphic arts industry in America has been discussed by many in the industry and by researchers and technicians who have explored the implications of the big changeover.

Some 90 per cent of the world's population has adopted the metric system with the U.S. among one of the chief holdouts adhering to the traditional system. Other holdouts are Canada, Australia and South Africa. The metric system is based on tens, or multiples of ten. We used a decimal system when the nation was founded, but the new nation followed England in its weights and measures, based on strange origins of both measures and weights.

Basic units in the metric system are the meter and the kilogram and from the other units of length and mass are derived. The metric units are uniform throughout the world, but the older system has variations. A gallon and an "Imperial" gallon are different. Some of the liquid measures are different.

Of immediate interest to pressmen are the problems raised by a metric changeover to the printing and graphic arts industry. Use of metric measurements is by no means new in the U.S. They are widely used in the chemical, optometric, electronic and pharmaceutical industries. The metric system is said to be more precise and the more demanding precision is in an industry the more that industry leans on a system which provides complete accuracy.

Printing machinery manufacture is certainly a precise science and the manufacture and compounding of printing papers and ink are scientific pursuits. How weights and measurements are used in printing is so taken for granted that most craftsmen in the industry seem to pay little attention to the system used. Weight is a critical matter in paper as is, of course, precise measurement. The machinery used, the tools of the craftsmen are geared to the older system. Even the thickness of paper is measured as fractional part of inches. Wherever measurement is needed, the metric system offers an improvement, say its advocates.

In the process of translating copy from manuscript to the printed page measurement is critical. The point-pica system is used: 12 points are 1 pica and 6 picas are an inch or to be exact .996 of an inch. Many photoengravers use the inch system and conversions are sometimes necessary for accuracy. But the system is in itself repete with variations. American industry is faced with many cases of conversion and these become expensive; some estimates place the cost of conversions in U.S. industry into the high hundreds of millions.

A commission has been named to make a study of the feasibility of conversion to the metric system and two union representatives are on the panel. They are Vernon E. Jirikowic of the Machinists and James E. Noe of the Electrical Workers. Labor has a real stake in a changeover. Craftsmen's tools would have to be changed in a large part and some estimates place the cost of a national changeover at $11 billion over a 20-year period. Retraining would be necessary for workers and new training concepts for new apprentices would be used.

Thousands of Americans have been introduced to various aspects of the metric system in their overseas military service in World War II, Korea, Vietnam and other overseas duty. The changeover may not, in general, be as difficult as many suppose.

The AFL-CIO asks that workers be protected and not suffer as the result of retooling necessary or the necessity for retraining. Labor will not be a roadblock to progress in this or other changes, but labor must insist that the worker not have to shoulder an inordinate burden in the name of technical efficiency.

Dear Mr. Allen:

I was happy to receive your letter about the printing pressman's program in April. I will be available to teach with your group.

It was helpful to receive the other materials which you have enclosed. If there are any other reports discussing mergers or district council programs, I would be happy to see them as well.

I look forward to working with you.

Mr. Emory Via, Director
Labor Program
Southern Regional Council
5 Forsythe Street, N. W.
Atlanta, Georgia 30303

Dear Mr. Via:

I understand that Al Kehrer has contacted you after receiving a phone call from George Guernsey about helping with a seminar which we are putting on in Atlanta. I understand that you expressed a willingness to serve as one of our discussion leaders at that seminar. I would like to explain what we are attempting to do.

The seminar is scheduled for the Atlanta American Motor Hotel on April 18, which is the middle day of a 3-day conference of our Southern Conference of Specialty Workers and is also shared by a District Joint Council composed of craft unions called the Deep South District Joint Council. We will be asking locals from Alabama, Florida, Georgia, North Carolina, South Carolina and Tennessee to attend this area seminar.

We have approximately 65 locals in that area, about one-half of which are quite small. Some of these locals could achieve an effective operation if they could be persuaded to merge into a single organization and this is a part of the background of our education approach to these seminars. We also have a District Joint Council program, which is intended to tie the local unions to the point of supporting one or more fulltime officers. The Deep South Council has not yet achieved the proper financial arrangement to afford a fulltime officer and we would hope to encourage action which would bring this about in the near future.

We are recognizing that the tradition of this union has been to grant charters to any group of a minimum of 10 members and to assume that they could look out for their own problems with a minimum of help. We now recognize that such locals have very slight chances of operating effectively, but our rules are such that we must approach them with a selling job rather than a mandatory order. Therefore, it is our thought that our program would revolve around discussions which would point out the necessary functions and programs of an effective local union and use some kind of measuring device so that the delegates could measure the effectiveness of their own locals. We think that having reviewed the necessary functions and programs, these locals will be in a frame of mind to respond to suggestions for mergers where possible and support the District Joint Council programs.

I am enclosing a copy of an outline of the areas which I think should be covered in a discussion on building better local unions. I recognize that this is somewhat superficial and that we are expecting to cover a large territory by hitting on all of these points in the few hours that we have.

An outline of the program would call for two sessions on this general subject, as outlined above, with a later session in the day which would sum up the conclusions reached in the discussion and provide the recommendations of the participants, as well as the International Union's Board of Directors.

We hope also to have a brief session on our program for craft training and retraining and a separate session on multi-plant bargaining for our specialty workers. At the evening dinner we have invited Barney Weeks, President of the Alabama State AFL-CIO to stress the necessity for our locals to be active in the labor movement outside of their own union and to take part in the political action and legislative programs of organized labor.

For your additional information, I am enclosing a copy of the December issue of News and Views, our union journal. Note page 1 and the center spread.

If you have any questions or if you would like to contact me directly, please feel free to call me collect.

With best wishes and kind regards, I am

Sincerely,

Walter M. Allen

THE EFFECTIVE LOCAL UNION

PURPOSES: (Reasons for Unions)

1. Negotiate best possible contracts for wages and working conditions.
2. Administer and enforce such contracts.
3. Inform and educate members.
4. Unify workers by identifying and seeking common goals.
5. Combine talents and resources of members.
6. Develop and operate programs and relationships which aid the central purposes of union.
7. Relate desires and needs of members to the mechanism for achieving them, i.e., the union.
8. Protect and widen union's jurisdiction.

NECESSARY COMPONENTS:

1. Qualified and dedicated officers.
2. Effective second-line leaders (stewards, chapel chairman, committeemen).
3. Informed and unified membership.
4. Good and well-attended union meetings.
5. Successful collective bargaining and contract administration.
6. Active affiliations -- internal and external.
7. Program for attracting and activating new members.
8. Sufficient financial funds and resources.
9. Proper Union Structure.

Leaders
Stewards Committees
Planning — goal-setting

I. Strong Leadership

A. Officers:

An effective local union ---

1. Attracts most experienced and qualified members as officers.

2. Offers adequate financial inducements for use of officers' time and effort.

3. Provides an opportunity, and requires officers to participate in educational and training programs.

4. Encourages and expects leaders to show initiative in suggesting and implementing union goals.

5. Leaders make proper preparation for activites and promptly perform routine duties.

6. Executive Board:

   a. Meets separately and recommends actions to body.
   b. Officers relate and respond to programs and goals of International Union.

7. Rank and file members are encouraged to serve.
8. Knows value of publicity (News and Views).

B. Second-line leadership:

An effective local union has ---

1. Active and responsible steward system: See Kit

   a. Trained (education course graduates)
   b. Informed (familiar with contract and union rules)
   c. Compensated
   d. Recognized
   e. Encouraged to take responsibility

   (See AFL-CIO Steward Manual)

Devoted steward role — representative

Responsibility to individual members, but to K enforcement, Conditions, Union as institution

What Committees?

Committee System efficiency — guarantees performance in areas of interest to union

2. Active Committee System:

   a. Standing Committees
      1. Education
      2. Apprenticeship
      3. Election
      4. Organizing
      5. Political Action (COPE)
      6. Community Services
      7. Bargaining
      8. Other
   b. Special Committees
      1. Investigative
      2. Special Events
   c. High level of activity of each and make regular reports to body.

3. Delegates:

   a. Both officer and non-officer
   b. Attend all functions and actively participate in each organization in which union is affiliated
   c. Make regular reports.

II. Active Membership

An effective union's membership is ---

A. Informed: (Communication)

1. By stewards
2. At union meetings
3. Local news letter
4. City labor newspaper
5. International Union journal (News and Views)
6. New member, etc. brochures

Add Regular Press

B. Unified:

1. Chapel or department meetings, as needed.
2. Members support officers
3. Officers seek help and opinions of members
4. Rally to action in emergency or when union is threatened

See: "From the Beginning"
"Why Unions"

An effective union has good and well-attended union meetings ---

C. Members recognize purpose of meetings:

1. To educate and inform membership
2. To make necessary decisions, democratically
3. To develop feeling of brotherhood
4. To share leadership and responsibility and obtain concensus

D. Union meetings provide:

1. Attractive arrangements

   a. Attractive meeting place
   b. Proper time
   c. Publicity

2. Attractive Program

   a. Agenda
      1. Prepared in advance
      2. In order of importance
   b. Rules
      1. Follow parliamentary procedures
      2. Not too formal
   c. Special events -- high point
   d. Encourage discussion
   e. Start promptly
   f. Keep interesting
   g. Keep moving
   h. End on time
   i. Encourage socializing afterward

Note: See booklet "How To Run a Union Meeting". Also leaflet "Securing Membership Participation in Union Activities".

III. Vigorous Organizing Program

An effective local union never stops organizing ---

A. Reasons for organizing:

1. To remove non-union competition

2. To strengthen bargaining unit

3. To widen union influence

4. To maintain internal strength and unity

An effective local union has ---

B. Active organizing program:

1. Organizing committee:

   a. Locating and contacting non-union workers
   b. Familiar with legal rights and restrictions
   c. Helpful to full-time organizers

2. Full-time organizer:

   a. Local officer or business agent
   b. Council representative

3. Training and aids:

   a. Relationship to International and AFL-CIO or CLC

C. New member indoctrination:

1. Orientation and education courses "welcome"

   a. Explaining union tradition and rules
   b. Explaining contract

2. Impressive ceremonies

D. Individual member activity:

1. Attendance at meetings

2. Committee or other responsibility

E. Flexible organizing approach:

1. Craft jurisdiction

2. Industrial (production and maintenance)

3. All crafts (graphic arts crafts combined)

4. Other

See: "Why Unions"
"In the Beginning"
"Youth Protest -- "

(also see kit)

IV. SUCCESSFUL COLLECTIVE BARGAINING

An effective local union knows the reasons and methods of successful collective bargaining ---

A. Union objectives in collective bargaining:

1. Establish equality of bargaining power with employer or employers.

2. Uniformity of conditions of employment.

3. Strong voice in plant operations affecting members.

4. Obtain optimum wages, benefits, and working conditions for employees.

B. Is aware of determinants of bargaining unit area:

1. Tradition

2. Area of employer competition and/or product market

3. Legal limitations (NLRB rules)

4. Jurisdiction (craft) autonomy

C. Recognizes kind and area of bargaining unit area:

1. Craft:

   a. Single plant -- single city
   b. Multi-plant (city or area)

2. Industrial (all production and maintenance workers):

   a. Single plant -- single city
   b. Multi-plant -- single or multi-city
   c. Company-wide -- multi-city

D. Knows differences in collective bargaining structure and methods in different branches of union:

1. Newspaper

   a. Monopoly or semi-monopoly
   b. Local area product
   c. High profit operations
   d. Perishable product
   e. New trend -- chain operation
   f. Craft-skill oriented (changing)

2. Commercial:

   a. Highly competitive
   b. Many small plants
   c. Mainly local market
   d. Some area or national market plants
   e. Great variety of equipment and product
   f. New trends
      1. Merger
      2. Larger plants
   g. Craft-skill oriented (changing)

3. Specialty:

   a. Highly competitive
   b. Local or national area product
   c. Self-trained employees
   d. High proportion of semi-skilled and unskilled employees
   e. Often located in rural areas
   f. Industrial-type bargain unit

E. Knows the Pros and Cons of local autonomy:

1. Pros:

   a. Direct relationship of bargaining to those affected
   b. Freedom from "outside" controls or obligations
   c. Pleases employers

2. Cons:

   a. Ignores realities of employer's competitive area
   b. Loses benefits of support and aid of International Union and area organization
   c. Relates success to size and strenght of individual local union

F. Seeks new approaches to Collective bargaining:

Needs:

1. Strongest possible bargaining unit

2. Sufficient finances

3. Aids of Council and International Union

4. Knowledge of changes in technology

5. Liaison with other locals dealing with same employer

   a. Intra-union
   b. Inter-union

6. Full-time, trained negotiators

7. Replace bargain-basement or collective "begging" with effective, strong collective bargaining program.

   See: "Collective Bargaining in a Democracy"

V. Adequate Financing

An effective local union knows ---

A. Basis and limitations of proper financing program:

1. Needed and desired programs are established first, then members asked for funds.

2. Local has, or seeks, sufficient number of members to share cost of programs without excessive burden.

3. Direct and indirect returns to individual members must exceed his investment (dues and assessments).

4. Officers must be aware that:

   a. Any dues increase is considered a direct (visible) tax by members.
   b. Unlike most taxes, increase may be approved or disapproved (and law requires adequate notice).
   c. Members must be convinced of need.

5. Local union remains dependent upon large measure of volunteer time and effort of members and officers.

B. Establishes and lives within budget:

1. Lists sources of income

2. Lists probable expenditures

C. Seeks formula for dues increases which eliminates need for periodic votes.

1. Possible choices:

   a. Hourly wage plus per capita taxes to affiliates
   b. Percentage of wage increase

D. Makes regular financial reports:

1. Monthly

2. Annually

   a. With analysis

3. Recognizing members' interest and need to justify expenses

VI. Recognition of Union Structure

An effective local union knows the need and limitations of union structure ---

A. Based upon lines of authority (formal):

B. Based upon changing needs of local unions (informal)
Local union structure may be based internally upon:

1. Collective bargaining pattern

   a. Single plant unit
   b. Multi-plant unit
   c. Single city unit
   d. Metropolitan or common market area unit
   e. Industry unit
   f. Relationship with other locals (Councils)

C. New criteria for modifying union structure:

1. Size of local union

   a. Large enough jurisdiction to cover competitive area
   b. Sufficient membership base to support expense of necessary programs, and highest level of leadership
   c. Large enough to support full-time operation (full-time officers)

2. Council approach

   a. Need for communication
   b. Need for standardization of conditions
   c. Common goals and time schedule
   d. Division and sharing of responsibilities and costs
   e. Value of periodical area conferences and seminars
   f. Question of mandatory versus voluntary membership in Councils
   g. Question of authority of Councils

3. Possible experiments in new structure and programs

   a. Merger/consolidation of like locals in close proximity seeking optimum size for area operation
   b. Greater financial support for existing Councils
   c. Forming Councils limited to metropolitan areas
   d. Sharing of organizers

4. Communication

   a. Need for two-way communication between locals and International officers and staff
   b. Maximum use of News and Views

B. Weeks

VII. Need For Active Affiliations

An effective local union

A. Knows reasons for:

1. Sending delegates
2. Participating actively
3. Supporting Affiliate's programs
4. Reporting to membership

B. Belongs to internal union organizations:

1. Conferences, area and national
2. District Council or District Joint Council

C. Belongs to external organizations:

1. Local AFL-CIO or CLC central bodies
2. State or provincial AFL-CIO or CLC bodies
3. Allied printing trades councils
4. Community organizations

D. Emphasizes membership recognition of need for:

1. Information on activites of other unions and AFL-CIO or CLC
2. Expanding influence of locals
3. Aid and support to each other
4. Stronger political voice (COPE)

See: "Memo From COPE"
"Your COPE Dollar Drive"

SMALLER CITIES prove good targets for public-employe unions.

Unions or "voluntary associations" that represent municipal workers now exist in 82% of the nation's cities with populations under 50,000, according to a survey by the City Managers' Association. Two years ago, only 54% of the cities had such organizations. Ninety-one per cent of bigger cities have public-employe unions or associations, up from 86% in 1967.

The association estimates 64% of all city workers in the U.S. "are represented by an organization concerned with working conditions or compensation." Municipal employes are most highly organized in New England; the South is the least organized, but unions are stepping up activity in Dixie. Occupationally, fire fighters are the most highly organized group.

The survey shows that over half the nation's cities still lack specific procedures for dealing with unions.

Public Employes Upheld On Rights to Join Unions

AFL-CIO News 1-25-69

St. Louis—Public employes have a right under the U. S. Constitution to belong to unions, according to a unanimous ruling by the 8th U. S. Circuit Court of Appeals here.

"Union membership is protected by the right of association under the First and Fourteenth Amendments," the court held in an opinion written by Judge Gerald W. Heaney.

The State, County & Municipal Employes took the appeal to the court on behalf of two members who, the union contended, were fired from the North Platte, Neb., Street Dept. for union activity.

The decision holds that the constitutional right of public employes to join a union is protected under the First Amendment. It is made applicable to states under the Fourteenth Amendment.

The court specifically rejected the traditional argument that public employes "have no federally protected right to be continued in public employment."

The ruling also establishes that public employes may bring suit in federal court for compensatory and punitive damages, as well as attorneys' fees, against individuals who interfere with their constitutionally-protected rights.

The SCME suit was brought against a North Platte city commissioner as an individual, since a direct suit against a state or political subdivision is barred by the Eleventh Amendment of the Constitution.

Membership Rights

In its opinion, the court quoted an earlier ruling that the right of assembly protects more than "the right to attend a meeting; it includes the right to express one's attitude or philosophies by membership in a group or by affiliation with it or by other lawful means."

Ronald Rosenberg, SCME counsel, said the ruling "makes clear that any statute barring public employes from joining unions, or discriminating against workers for joining unions, are unconstitutional."

Alabama, for example, has a law prohibiting state employes from joining unions that, until now, has not been successfully challenged.

"We have every reason to expect that federal courts in other jurisdictions will follow the ruling rendered by the Eight Circuit," Rosenberg said.

SCME President Jerry Wurf said the ruling "supports our belief that public employes are entitled to the fundamental right to join a union that is now enjoyed by nearly all workers in private industry."

"This is only a first step toward equality for the public employe," he added. "For the legal right of an employe to join a union to be effective, there must also be a law requiring recognition of the union as the employes' representative. And we must also have a law requiring that public officials participate in good-faith collective bargaining with the organization chosen by the employes as their representative.

"These are basic rights in a free society," he asserted. "We are gratified with the unanimous court opinion that provides the first of these necessary steps."

Public Employe Strikes Divide Top Arbitrators

New York—Two of the nation's best-known arbitrators took opposite positions on the issue of public employe strikes.

Theodore W. Kheel, who played a major role in setting up the Institute of Collective Bargaining and who has been an indispensable trouble-shooter for mayors of New York, had this to say:

"Collective bargaining cannot exist if employes may not withdraw their services. . . . Collective bargaining is the best way of composing differences between workers and their employers in a democratic society. So, if we believe public employes should have bargaining rights, we must accept the possibility of a strike and consider how best to guard against it."

Kheel suggested that cities and states adopt the emergency disputes provision of the Taft-Hartley Act if the community's health or safety is involved. But he reiterated, "When all strikes are barred, collective bargaining or joint determination is out."

David L. Cole, who helped frame New York State's labor relations law which includes penalties against unions and union members for striking, disagreed.

"Why should we deliberately revert to the primitive days of labor relations" when there are alternatives to strikes?, he asked. He said allowing unions to shut down essential public services in effect allows them "unilateral determination of wages and working conditions."

At another panel, Prof. George W. Taylor, chief author of the New York labor law, said states and cities don't have the money to meet all the needs and demands for services. Allowing public employes to strike, he suggested, would be imposing their claims in isolation from the overall priorities of government.

Jerry Wurf, president of the State, County & Municipal Employes, said he has come to the "disquieting conclusion that the very same public official . . . arbitrator . . . academician . . . who enthusiastically supports full and unhindered collective bargaining in private industry, is perfectly willing to accept the most biased, slanted, one-sided system when it involves public workers."

Too often, he charged, "government has been allowed to cling to the right to be exempt from reasonableness and responsibility in its own labor-management relations."

At a panel dealing with the federal service, Thomas R. Donahue, executive secretary of the Service Employes, spoke of the growth of unionism in that sector.

He said the 1962 presidential order on union recognition "was recognized at the outset as a beginning step, a platform for further development."

Whether improvements come about through legislation or a new executive order, he predicted "a continuing development of the unions representing federal employes, not just in terms of size, but in terms of staff services, professionalism and overall effectiveness."

States Urged to Affirm Public Employe Rights

State laws should firmly establish the right of public employes to union representation and meaningful collective bargaining, the AFL-CIO told the Advisory Commission on Intergovernmental Relations.

The commission, made up of federal, state, city and county officials and private citizens, is considering a staff report which poses an assortment of alternative approaches to state legislation.

The alternatives range from a mandatory commitment to collective bargaining in the public sector to a toothless grant of "permission" for local governments "to meet and confer with employe organizations."

AFL-CIO Legislative Representatives Clinton Fair and Kenneth A. Meiklejohn said the bargaining procedures should be flexible enough to permit unions and public employers to work out solutions to complex problems. It should offer a variety of approaches to avoid strikes—but affirm the right to strike when all procedures have been exhausted.

Similar views were expressed in testimony before the commission by Thomas R. Donahue, executive secretary of the Service Employes, and in a statement from Pres. Jerry Wurf of the State, County & Municipal Employes.

Some of the most bitter struggles in public employment have been fought to establish the right of public workers to union recognition and collective bargaining, Wurf noted. "Disputes over recognition are responsible for more strikes in public employment than any other single issue," he said.

Donahue urged the commission members not to "take the path of least resistance" and recommended that public employes be barred from striking.

"The right to strike is what brings reality to negotiations," he said. "It is that right which turns conversations into discussions, and discussions into bargaining, and bargaining into agreements with which parties can live in harmony for a number of years at a time."

The basic AFL-CIO testimony stressed that labor does not object to requiring a series of steps to seek a settlement before a strike can take place, including mediation, fact-finding and the offer of voluntary binding arbitration.

But only in the case of law enforcement officers, the AFL-CIO said, should there be a flat ban on striking as a last resort.

The AFL-CIO suggested that a state law establish a single labor-relations agency for public employes, comparable to the National Labor Relations Board and separate from mediation and fact-finding activities.

Dues Checkoff Urged

Public employers and unions should be permitted to negotiate union security provisions as well as a dues checkoff, the federation said. And where a union has exclusive bargaining rights because it represents a majority of employes in the unit, "that organization alone should have the exclusive right of dues checkoff."

The labor witnesses stressed that it is appropriate and desirable to have state and federal minimum standards dealing with wages and working conditions in public employment, with the parties free to improve on those minimums through negotiations, just as unions and employers do in the private sector of the economy.

Fair, who presented the AFL-CIO testimony, cited the hospital workers' strike in Charleston, S.C., and the highway workers' dispute in West Virginia as evidence of the bitter antagonism to union organization by many public employers.

Neither of these strikes would have been necessary, he noted, if there had been effective union recognition and collective bargaining legislation in those states.

Charlotte garbage workers went on strike Tuesday, July 29, 1969, and were immediately taken off the payroll.
By city estimates, 490 men took the day off. Union representatives vowed that the strike could last for 100 days.

City Manager william J. Veeder sent telegrams to all striking employes say "you are herby advised that your pay and benefits were stopped as of July, 29, 1969.

James M. Pierce, regional director of the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employes, stood on the hood of a coffee wagon and told the large crowd of men to go home. "This will be a peaceful strike if the city wants a peaceful strike. Or it will be the bloodiest strike in the world, if that's what they want," Pierce said

The union was asking for a new grievance procedure, better treatment, recognition of seniority and - the key issue and the one least likely to be resolved - a dues check-off system.

City manager W.J. Veeder and Mayor Belk said the sanitation workers would be getting an increase of $4.40 a week next month and another increase of $4.00 per week in March.

Beginning Wednesday Veeder said the hourly rate for beginning sanitation workers becomes $2.21 and goes to $2.31 and the hourly rates for truck drivers begins at $2.66 and goes to $2.77

As of today, the sanitation workers have not been able to gain the wanted support from the employes of the Street and Sewer Division. Pierce told the Street and Sewer Division workers that "if you decide to work, I'll still be your friend, but I won't respect you as much. He told them them to teach John Belk that you are men.

Member of NLRB suggests steps in public bargaining

Atlantic City, N.J.

Although the National Labor Relations Board is not involved in labor-management relations in public employment, Sam Zagoria, member of the board, believes that experience in the private sector of the economy can help in the relatively new but growing field of government jobs.

In a speech before the American Library Association here, Zagoria suggested three steps in government collective bargaining:

- Machinery for determining majority will, whether it takes the form of secret ballot or election, petition, signing of individual cards, or showing of hands.
- Training in the techniques of collective bargaining for government officials who may be gifted administrators but who have little experience in collective bargaining.
- A mechanism for dispute settlement if the bargaining process reaches a deadlock. "This stage is a crucial one in government bargaining where the right to strike normally does not exist," Zagoria said. "Those who judge collective bargaining tend to measure it by the success of this step."

Zagoria said that his own favorite for resolving deadlocks is "fact-finding." He said that fact-finding has advantages for both the government worker and the government administrator. He said that fact-finding could help place the issues in focus and be of benefit to government bodies and to the public in general.

No Cure-all. Fact-finding, he said, has the virtue "of putting emphasis on cold facts, rather than hot tempers; of bringing the public, which consumes the services and pays the bills, into the bargaining picture with a chance to achieve fair play. While it is no cure-all in disagreements, it is positive. It offers machinery for peace, not merely penalties."

Zagoria stressed the immense growth of organization in public employment during recent years. He noted that by 1966, 1,700,000 public workers had joined unions and that currently the growth is estimated at the average rate of 1,000 new members every working day.

Bargaining Law Sought For Public Employes

Atlantic City—A federal law to spell out organizing and bargaining rights for employes of state, county and municipal governments has been called for by the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept.

The proposal was recommended in a report on "collective bargaining in the public sector" submitted to and approved by delegates to the department's eighth constitutional convention.

The report is based on a study authorized by the department's executive board in February 1968 and made by a 12-member committee headed by Pres. Jerry Wurf of the State, County & Municipal Employes.

The study reached two major conclusions about unionism and bargaining among workers in state and local governments:

- They work "without any protective legislation in the turbulent 1960s—an era when governments, caught up in crises beyond their understanding, enact repressive laws based on incomplete and irrational theories."
- A hodge-podge of state laws reveals the "urgent need" for a federal law "with minimum standards, to give broad and systematic legitimacy to the public employes cause."

In another area, the report urged repeal of restrictions against the right of public employes to strike except in cases "where the public health and safety would be endangered."

It emphasized that the harsh punishments called for in no-strike laws for public employes "have not deterred public employes from withholding their services" and, in fact, have increased tensions and antagonisms.

The report also urged enactment of a labor relations law for federal employes—similar to the National Labor Relations Act — to govern bargaining and provide machinery for resolving impasses in federal labor-management relations.

It supported legislation to that effect introduced in Congress by Sen. Gale W. McGee (D-Wyo.) and Rep. Thaddeus J. Dulski (D-N.Y.). The measure is supported by the AFL-CIO.

Study Committee

Members of the department's study committee in addition to Wurtz were Pres. Howard Coughlin, Office & Professional Employes; and the following union counsels: Lester Asher, Cement Workers; David S. Barr, Painters; Jon Flinker, Retail Clerks; Ed J. Hickey, Fire Fighters; Isadore Katz, United Textile Workers; C. V. Koons, Communications Workers; Martin F. O'Donoghue, Plumbers & Pipe Fitters; Louis P. Poulton, Machinists; Francis X. Ward, Carpenters; and Henry T. Wilson, Laborers.

First Tie Between the AFT, NEA Forged As Flint, Mich., Affiliates Form a New Unit

By RICHARD J. LEVINE
Staff Reporter of THE WALL STREET JOURNAL

WASHINGTON—The first formal link has been forged between two rivals for the allegiance of the nation's teachers, the National Education Association and the American Federation of Teachers.

The million-member NEA will announce today that the two organizations' Flint, Mich., affiliates approved a merger agreement over the weekend. Leaders of the NEA and the AFT took widely disparate views, however, on the importance of the Flint merger toward prospects for unification of the two groups at the national level.

In a statement on the Flint development, NEA president George Fischer will hail the merger as a "model" that could pave the way for "one comprehensive organization" of teachers throughout the country. "Teachers in other communities will be taking similar action and within 10 years we will have one unified voice for all teachers," Mr. Fischer's statement says. "This will happen because the common concerns which bring us together are far more important than the organizational differences which keep us apart."

David Selden, president of the 175,000-member AFT, and a strong advocate of merger, said in a weekend telephone interview that the Flint situation "is a local phenomenon to take care of a local situation." The AFT doesn't "consider it pattern-setting," he said. Under the merger plan approved, he observed, "we feel we're being swallowed up" in Flint.

Mr. Selden went on, "We feel it's a very satisfactory arrangement in view of the circumstances in Flint," where the union has lost two representation elections to the NEA since 1966 and is considerbly weaker than its rival, and where teachers are wearying of the constant organizational battling.

Details of the Flint merger indicate both the greater strength of the NEA there and the difficulty of devising a unification formula, even at the local level, with which both sides can live.

The agreement in Flint, where 1,500 of the 2,100 public school teachers belong to the NEA and 270 are members of the union, provides for establishment of a new organization, the United Teachers of Flint, which will be affiliated with both the NEA and the AFT.

The NEA's upper hand in Flint also is evident in the dues structure. Part of the dues will go automatically to the Michigan Education Association and the NEA. Members of the United Teachers of Flint who wish to affiliate with the AFT will have half their union dues paid out of the treasury of the new organization.

The Flint merger comes one year after former NEA president Elizabeth Koontz, currently head of the Labor Department's Women's Bureau, rejected an invitation from Mr. Selden to open merger talks at the national level. Soon after that rejection, however, the NEA adopted a position amenable to merger talks at the local level.

This is reflected in Mr. Fischer's statement: "I am pleased that this merger was the result of membership action on the local level. It is not the by-product of the negotiations of two national organizations in Washington, D.C. Such action, by members, on the local and state levels, is the most effective way to teacher unity."

Talks aimed at studying "the feasibility of establishing a relationship" between the Massachusetts organizations of the NEA and the AFT have been under way for several months.

Despite the movements in Michigan and Massachusetts, a full merger of the NEA and AFT will be difficult to achieve, it is expected. Many members of the NEA, which is strongest in rural and suburban areas and small cities, are suspicious of the militant union. Indeed, one NEA official conceded that many of "our conservative people will react a little negatively" to the Flint merger.

In many places around the country the two organizations are still battling strenuously. In Newark, N.J., for example, the AFT is hopeful of beating the NEA in a coming representation election.

The AFT's strength lies in such big cities as New York, Chicago and Detroit. First to use the strike weapon to improve teachers' wages and working conditions, the union's success in organizing big-city teachers has been a major factor in turning the once docile NEA into a more vigorous organization, though it still officially rejects being called a union.

Police in Many Cities Shed Nonpartisan Role For Active Politicking

Detroit White Officers Back Sheriff Gribbs for Mayor, Angering Negro Contender

'No Politics' Rules Flouted

By ART GLICKMAN
Staff Reporter of THE WALL STREET JOURNAL

DETROIT—"Everybody else can indulge in politics—every black group, every political party group, every church group," says Carl Parsell, president of the 3,500-member Detroit Police Officers Association (DPOA). "Why are police officers so different?"

Maybe they aren't. Political activism by the heavily white DPOA has become a lively issue in the race for mayor between Wayne County Sheriff Roman S. Gribbs, who is white, and Wayne County Auditor Richard H. Austin, a Negro. The policemen's group has endorsed Mr. Gribbs, as well as eight other whites running for seats on the city Common Council.

Off-duty patrolmen are performing chores such as helping to register voters. On Nov. 4, they will help get voters to the polls. The 525-member Detroit Police Lieutenants and Sergeants Association and the 500-member Detroit Police Detectives Association also are contributing manpower—plus several thousand dollars—to the Gribbs campaign.

Irritated Candidate

Never before have the three organizations openly campaigned for a mayoral candidate. Mr. Austin, the black contender, is angry. So are black police officers, who complain that they have no policy-making influence in the DPOA.

Mr. Austin has charged that political activism by "men who have the power of life and death over individuals" does "violence" to the concept of civilian control over police. And he has suggested that Mr. Gribbs might have promised the policemen special treatment. Mr. Gribbs denies any promises of favors, asserts that policemen have a constitutional right to engage in political activity in their off hours, out of uniform and scoffs at the notion of a developing police state. "I have too much faith in the policemen and their goodwill and their common sense," he says.

The debate over police and politics reaches into many cities. For decades, state or local laws in many areas have banned policemen from activism. A tradition of nonpartisanship has inhibited others. But now policemen in ever-increasing numbers are shedding their nonpartisan stance—often flouting the law—to take part in municipal elections.

But now policemen in ever-increasing numbers are shedding their nonpartisan stance—often flouting the law—to take part in municipal elections.

The trend became evident last spring when white police officers campaigned for the reelection of Mayor Sam Yorty in Los Angeles, and for the election of Charles Stenvig, a detective, as mayor of Minneapolis.

The Crime Rate

Rising crime tolls and the heated issue of "law and order" seem to have provoked many officers to political activism. "People are fed up with this growing crime rate, and there's nobody more frustrated about it than the policeman," says Norm Moore, a former Los Angeles detective who helped organize policemen and firemen to work for Mr. Yorty. Policemen particularly seethe over Supreme Court decisions that they believe favor the rights of suspects to the detriment of effective police work.

Many white policemen also believe that the prominence of the civil rights cause has disrupted the political balance in their cities. All too often, they complain, the arguments of the black militants prevail at city hall.

This fall there is political activism by policemen in many localities. The Seattle Police Officers Guild is working for the election of its president to the city council. Police in Hartford, Conn., are prohibited from political activity, but the wives of policemen are working for the election of George ('Pete') Kinsella as mayor, and, one officer says, "They're probably getting a lot of help from their husbands."

Texas law forbids police activity in politics, but many Houston officers are edging toward overt support of Mayor Louie Welch for reelection. "Lots of us would like to go out and openly campaign for him," says Sgt. J. A. Knigge, secretary of the Houston Police Officers Association. "I'm pretty sure some of us will."

The usually nonpolitical Fraternal Order of Police, in Cleveland recently took out a full-page newspaper advertisment listing shortcomings in police administration and calling on Mayor Carl Stokes, a Negro, to make improvements. The FOP says the ad wasn't politically motivated, but some observers suspect that it helped Mr. Stokes' challenger, Ralph J. Perk. In Pittsburgh, some officers were directed to remove from their patrol cars bumper stickers that supported Eugene Coon, a former assistant superintendent of police who is running for county sheriff.

"Bargaining and Campaigning"

Royce Givens, executive secretary of the International Conference of Police Associations, believes that policemen are becoming more political as they win the right to organize and bargain collectively. Carl Parsell, whose association is exclusive bargaining agent for Detroit's patrolmen, says, "We have found our negotiating power is tied together with political power." Mr. Givens sees a big increase in the number of policemen running for office and says he expects the trend to grow.

For policemen to engage in politics isn't new. Arthur F. Brandstatter, head of the department of police administration at Michigan State University, says that three or four decades ago policemen in most big cities were chosen for their jobs largely on the basis of political party and religion. They were expected to do political chores for the party in power.

That led to abuses and dissatisfaction. Sgt. Knigge of the Houston police recalls that in the 1940s one man who was active in local politics "went to 7 a.m. roll call as a patrolman, and at 11 a.m. he was chief of police." Civil service procedures eventually were instituted in most departments, calling for hiring and advancement on the basis of ability. Such regulations often prohibited policemen from political activity, singly or in groups. In many states the prohibition was written into statutes.

Now there is a growing feeling among policemen that such regulations deny them their constitutional rights. The Patrolmen's Benevolent Association of Nassau County, N.Y., has embarked on a test case, challenging in state supreme court a local restriction against off-duty politicking. The PBA expects to file suit in Federal court against a state law that forbids political activity by policemen.

The association lost the first round in its challenge when Justice Sol Wachtler of the state supreme court upheld the local restriction, ruling that police shouldn't engage in partisan politics "for fear that the authority and influence with which they are invested by the public could be used unfairly." The PBA has appealed the decision.

How effective police politicking is seems to depend on the city and the circumstances. Thomas Bradley, the black Los Angeles city councilman who lost to Mayor Yorty last May, says police had a "significant impact" in the race. Mr. Bradley, a former police lieutenant himself, charges that his old colleagues used "purely racist" tactics, exploiting the fears and prejudices of white voters.

Mr. Bradley believes that policemen can swing a lot of weight at the polls. "Many people respect them," he says. "They look at them as the champion and protector against the threat from minority communities, from militants, from students, from whoever is engaged in activities associated with unrest in our society."

Mr. Moore, the former Los Angeles detective who helped organize police and firemen to campaign, disputes the racist label. He says policemen opposed Mr. Bradley because they were fearful of the men surrounding him and because they believed he favored a civilian review board that would monitor police actions. "I don't think it hurt a thing to have policemen and firemen knocking on doors in precincts that went to Bradley in the primary," Mr. Moore says.

No Difference

In Minneapolis, Mr. Stenvig, the former detective, won the mayoralty by a big margin. Former Alderman Dan Cohen, the losing candidate, got less than 40% of the vote. Mr. Cohen traces his defeat to running against a policeman, rather than to politicking by off-duty officers. "The margin was too great for me to feel the police department tipped the scale," Mr. Cohen says.

Mayor Stenvig (who turned out on Moratorium Day in Minneapolis to personally direct a riot squad dispersing demonstrators) has become something of a hero to politically inclined policemen elsewhere in the nation. Mr. Stenvig has expressed his philosophy thus: "People are sick and tired of politicians and intellectuals. They want an average workingman from the community to represent them, and that's me."

In Detroit, nobody is certain how much effect the open police support for Sheriff Gribbs will have on the outcome of the race. However, supporters of Mr. Austin say that police and firemen mounted a well-financed campaign last year against a ballot proposition that cut their pension benefits. Although the change saved the taxpayers money, it passed only by about 20,000 votes.

Both Mr. Austin and Mr. Gribbs agree that law and order is a prime issue in the present campaign. Mr. Gribbs has avoided comment on the race issue, but many black politicians and black policemen see race as the underlying reason white policemen support Mr. Gribbs. Coleman A. Young, Negro minority whip in the Michigan senate, sees the white police involvement as "a call to arms against a black takeover" of the city.

Black and White

About 40% of Detroit's 1.5 million residents are black, but about 75% of the registered voters are white. More than 90% of the policemen are white. Mr. Young sees dire implications in the recently formed coalition called "Real Detroit." Its members: The Detroit Police Officers Association, the Police Detectives Association and the Greater Detroit Council of Homeowners, an all-white citizens' group.

In 1965, the homeowners group attempted unsuccessfully to get a proposal on the ballot that would have given property owners the right to refuse to rent or sell to any person for any reason. Mrs. William Otenbaker, executive secretary of the council, explains the motive for joining with the policemen: "They should be able to get out and do a job without having all the minority groups on their backs."

Patrolman Ronald Turner, leader of a dissident group of black policemen who may bolt the DPOA, says the coalition only reinforces the widespread belief among blacks that white policemen are the enemy, standing for "suppression by the white, middle-class community."

The police deny that racism is involved. "The number one issue is law enforcement," says Eljay Bowron, president of the detectives' association, "and there's never been a candidate who knew more about the problem of law enforcement than Roman Gribbs." Mr. Bowron says he opposes Mr. Austin for advocating a civilian review board.

Mr. Parsell, the DPOA leader, is pushing for more police activism in Michigan. He has organized several groups into the Michigan Police Officers Association, which intends to lobby for legislation that will help police and support political candidates sympathetic to police.

SCME gains South's highest sanitation pay

Miami

Metropolitan Miami sanitation workers, represented by SCME Local 1363, will become the highest paid waste collectors in the South as a result of winning a one-year contract that will raise the minimum salary from $4,680 to $5,928.

Labor Contract

The 495 sanitation men in the local ratified the pact unanimously and it has been approved by the Miami Metro (Dade County) Commission.

SCME International Vice President Lee Tafel, who is president of the local and director of SCME Council 22, said the increase means that salaries will now range from $2.85 to $3.07 an hour.

The county also will pay for workers' uniforms. Under the terms of the agreement, the workers will receive an additional two days sick leave annually and two additional holidays—Columbus Day and the day after Christmas.

Won't penalize workers. The pay raise will be financed by an anticipated increase in the garbage-trash collection fee charged residents. County Manager Porter Homer has recommended that it be raised from $34 to $54 a year.

John Van Wezel, an aide to Homer, said, "the county is not going to make the employees suffer if Metro is forced to limit the taxes to last year's 10.39-mil level."

The Florida State Comptroller's office had imposed the tax limitation on the county.

Jobs for Negroes

John J. Gibson Jr.

Miami Beach

Labor Contract List

Miami Beach is a prime target for civil rights demonstrations unless the business community starts an "all-out recruitment program" to hire more Negroes, SCME Local 1554 President John Gibson told a press conference.

The local has adopted a resolution to promote such a program.

Gibson, a member of the City Personnel Board, said he wanted an all-out drive before the winter season gets underway "to nip the problem in the bud.

"If hotels, restaurants and others in Miami Beach don't take a lesson from other cities, we will most likely have demonstrations," he said. "This I don't want to see."

Gibson continually pointed out that disorders could be averted by simply going to work with constructive efforts. He explained that in the past, hotels, restaurants and other businesses relied on Negroes for menial work.

"They don't even have that anymore," he said.

Postal Employee Unions

WASHINGTON RUN-AROUND . . . City governments throughout the country continue to adopt resotions memorializing the Congress in opposition to the Nixon-Blount proposed H.R. 11750, postal corporation, as the United Federation of Postal Clerks' "grass roots" campaign against the corporation accelerates. The Council of the City of PHILADELPHIA in a strongly worded resolution recently advised the 91st Congress of its support for the H.R. 4 postal modernization plan of House PO&CS Committee Chairman THADDEUS J. DULSKI (D-N.Y.) by conversely stating, "We declare our opposition to passage of H.R. 11750 which would create a postal corporation." The City Council of ERIE, PA. took similar action. In both instances, representations by officers of UFPC Philadelphia Local 89 and Erie Local 269 resulted in the resolutions being adopted and sent to Congress. . . . Senator RALPH YARBOROUGH (D-Tex.) in a recent speech in San Antonio, Texas, continued his all-out opposition to the H.R. 11750 postal corporation plan of the Administration. Senator Yarborough, the senior ranking member of the Senate PO&CS Committee, referred to his remarks as a report from the "BLOUNT-KAPPEL FRONT" in Washington. Yarborough reiterated his charges that a postal corporation would reduce rural mail service, skyrocket postage rates, take postal workers out from under the protection of the civil service system, and deny them the right of appeal or access to Congress. "The one reform the Post Office really needs is more cash in the pockets of postal workers and that's why I'm strongly supporting H.R. 13000, and I am very hopeful we can get enough Republican support to get this bill out of the Senate," Senator Yarborough told Texas postal employes in his well-received speech! . . . Western Union has filed a rate proposal with the Federal Communications Commission for a two-year test of "mailgram"—the proposed new telegram letter service designed for overnight delivery—developed in cooperation with the Post Office Department. Mailgram could eventually permit electronic transmission of messages to tele-printers at 110 post offices where they would be inserted in special envelopes for delivery to patrons by letter carriers. Postmaster General WINTON M. BLOUNT announced on December 1st in Washington that the mailgram test program will go into "live" operation early in January. Initially, MAILGRAMS will be accepted from Telex users in 12 cities throughout the country during the two-year experimental phase. Western Union will charge patrons the normal Telex rates plus a flat rate surcharge and will reimburse the Post Office at the rate of 25 cents for each message entered into the mails.

SENATE HEARINGS ON POSTAL PAY & REFORM END . . .

SENATE PO&CS COMMITTEE EXPECTED TO MEET IN H.R. 13000 EXECUTIVE SESSION

The Senate Post Office & Civil Service Committee has concluded hearings on pay and postal modernization. The Committee is expected to meet in executive session during the week of December 8th and "mark-up" a pay bill. This session may be scheduled on Tuesday, December 9th.

The Administration finally decided against presenting testimony at an open hearing on H.R. 13000 and CSC Chairman Robert E. Hampton in a letter dated December 1st stated the Administration's opposition to its enactment—see story elsewhere in this FNS. Hearings on postal modernization and reform were also concluded on December 1st (Monday) as the postal employe unions were the final witnesses.

President Francis S. Filbey and Legislative Director Patrick J. Nilan reiterated the Federation's opposition to the H.R. 11750 postal corporation and support of postal reform in detailed, concise, and unmistakable testimony. Details will be published in the January UPC&PTJ.

Every effort is being made by UFPC to convince the Senate PO&CS Committee to meet in executive session not later than Tuesday (December 9) and favorably report the pay bill, H.R. 13000. The Committee must act early next week or the opportunity to get the pay bill through the Congress and to President Nixon at least 10 days prior to adjournment will (for all practical purposes) become non-existent.

It appears NOW that our collective UFPC efforts have convinced the Senate Committee NOT to combine the pay bill with postal modernization. HOWEVER, as of this FNS Bulletin, we cannot report any final decisions on H.R. 13000 and the tie-in question by the PO&CS Committee.

PLEASE! Continue to contact YOUR respective two United States Senators in support of immediate action on H.R. 13000. REMEMBER! Our race with the Congressional adjournment "count down" is extremely critical.

CSC ANNOUNCES NEW 'OPEN SEASON' ON LIFE INSURANCE

The U. S. Civil Service Commission announced on December 5, an "OPEN SEASON" for regular and optional life insurance under the Federal employes' life insurance program.

CSC also stated that there would be no change in premium rates for regular insurance, but there would be a reduction in premiums for the more than 300,000 Government employes and annuitants who carry the $10,000 optional life insurance.

The "OPEN SEASON" will be held during the entire month of March, 1970; and the new reduced premium rates for optional life insurance will become effective at the beginning of the first pay period in April, 1970.

During the open season, employes who previously waived the regular or optional life insurance coverage will be permitted to enroll in both

ATTENTION UFPC LOCALS!

U. S. INTERNAL REVENUE NOTICES

Many of our UFPC Locals have been receiving notices from the U. S. Internal Revenue Service regarding the filing of "FORM 990." Federal law requires all tax-exempt organizations, including local unions, to file annual information returns on a FORM 990. This form is required to be filed even though the local union had no cash transactions during the year.

UFPC headquarters has received so many inquiries from local unions regarding this FORM 990 that it has been impossible to answer all of them on an individual basis. Secretary-Treasurer Owen H. Schoon has been in touch with the Internal Revenue Service here in Washington seeking assistance in simplifying the reporting requirements.

Within 30 to 45 days, UFPC National Headquarters expects to mail a simplified FORM 990 with instructions, which will enable each local union to comply with Internal Revenue Service requirements. Further information will be issued as soon as our inquiry to the Internal Revenue Service has been answered.

UFPC URGES $16 MOBILE EXPENSE AMENDMENT TO H.R. 13000

Legislative Director PATRICK J. NILAN has urged Chairman GALE W. McGEE and the Senate Post Office & Civil Service Committee to amend H.R. 13000 with a provision increasing the present $9 per diem expense allowance to at least $16. In a detailed statement presented to the Senate PO&CS Committee, UFPC strongly urged the amendment to H.R. 13000 for the following reasons:

(1) The present $9 per diem allowance for road (mobile) employes was established fourteen years ago, in 1955.

(2) The cost-of-living ALONE, since 1955 to the present has risen by 39.1% with no comparable increase in the per diem allowance during this fourteen-year period.

(3) The Congress and President Nixon have enacted Public Law 91-114 on November 10, 1969, increasing the per diem allowance for other Federal employes from $16 per day to $25. Certainly, mobile employes of the postal service are entitled to a comparable increase from $9 per day to at least $16. Particularly, since this is the second increase for Federal employes since 1955 and NO similar increases have been granted to mobile employes during the same period of time.

(4) While we cannot provide the Committee with a cost estimate of this amendment to H.R. 13000, we point out that there are only about 1,500 mobile employes remaining in the Postal Service and the related cost cannot be considered substantial or excessive.

NIXON-BLOUNT ADMINISTRATION FINALLY TELLS SENATE COMMITTEE OF H.R. 13000 OPPOSITION

The Administration, after weeks of "on again-off again" delaying tactics concerned with appearing before the Senate Post Office & Civil Service Committee and taking a public position on postal-federal employe pay raises, FINALLY opposed H.R. 13000 in a letter to Senator GALE W. McGEE (D-Wyo.), PO&CS Committee Chairman dated December 1st.

The four-page Administration position statement was signed by ROBERT E. HAMPTON, Chairman of the Civil Service Commission. However, from the tone and content of the letter, it would have appeared more appropriate if Postmaster General Winton M. Blount had signed the letter. The December 1st letter, according to CSC Chairman Hampton, was addressed to Chairman McGee, "In lieu of presenting oral testimony on H.R. 13000, I am, as requested writing to advise you of the Civil Service Commission's views on the bill." Mr. Hampton continued:

"H.R. 13000 as passed by the House is entirely unacceptable and the Commission urges that your Committee reject the bill. President Nixon in his letter to the Honorable Gerald Ford (Congressional Record, October 14, 1969, page H94491) has expressed the Administration's opposition to H.R. 13000 stressing the impact it would have on the nation's economy and on the Federal Budget.

"In addition to the objections stressed in the President's letter, the Commission strongly opposes its enactment because the procedure it provides for the future adjustment of salaries is clearly inappropriate to the need and because the retroactive pay adjustment and the accelerated within-grade advancement plan provided for postal employes are unsupported by the available evidence."

The balance of the four-page letter expressed in detail the "hard line" opposition of President Nixon, the Civil Service Commission, and the Bureau of the Budget (AND the Postmaster General, we are certain) to enactment of H.R. 13000. CONSPICUOUSLY absent was ANY reference to ANY pay raise for postal and federal employes as an alternative to H.R. 13000—NO AREA OF COMPROMISE WAS EVEN SUGGESTED!

SETTING UP DIVISION: Founding conference of National Hospital and Nursing Home Employees Union, a division of RWDSU, is addressed by Leon J. Davis, president of Local 1199. Two hundred and fifty delegates from various parts of the country attended the three-day conference.

National Hospital Division of RWDSU is Set Up

Story and Photos by CHARLES MICHAELSON

NEW YORK CITY—The combination of "union power" and "soul power" gave birth to a new RWDSU division—the National Hospital and Nursing Home Employees Union—at a three-day conference here Dec. 12 to 14.

The setting up of the division results from a decision made by the RWDSU Executive Board at its October meeting. That decision authorized the officers of the RWDSU to establish a structure within the International Union to make possible a large-scale organizing drive among hospital and nursing home employees.

This had followed reports on various successes achieved under the banner of the RWDSU during the past months, including a great 4½-month - long strike victory in Charleston, S.C. and organizing victories in New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Baltimore and other communities.

Participating in the New York conference were Pres. Max Greenberg and other leaders of the RWDSU, leaders of Local 1199, who are veterans of many organizing campaigns, and newer RWDSUers from Charleston, Baltimore, Pittsburgh, Philadelphia, Dayton, O. and Durham, N.C.

RWDSU leaders who addressed the 250 delegates were Pres. Greenberg, Int'l Sec.-Treas. Alvin E. Heaps, Vice-Pres. Bill Michelson, president of the United Storeworkers in New York City; 'Record' Editor Max Steinbock and Int'l Rep. Leon Harris, who has been involved in organizing hospital and nursing home workers in Massachusetts.

The conference sessions were chaired by Local 1199 Pres. Leon Davis, who will serve as president of the new division.

Other division officers appointed by Pres. Greenberg who played a leading role in the conference sessions are Elliott Godoff, executive vice-president; Henry Nicholas, secretary-treasurer; Moe Foner, executive secretary; Doris Turner, secretary; and William J. Taylor, John Black, David White, Aberdeen David, Fred Punch, Ramon Malave, Mary Moultrie, Leonard Seelig and Jesse Olson, all vice-presidents. George Glotzer, also a vice-president, was absent because of illness.

Pres. Greenberg and Sec.-Treas. Heaps will also serve on the executive board of the division, which will function until the election of officers at a convention of representatives of the unions composing the division.

Among the guest speakers at the conference were New York Deputy Mayor Timothy Costello; Harry Van Arsdale, president of the New York City Central Labor Council; the Rev. Andrew Young of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, which played a key role in the Charleston strike; and actor Ossie Davis.

The workshop sessions, held on the conference's final day, provided a unique opportunity for the hospital workers to exchange experiences and offer instruction to newer union members.

Four acquitted in Carolina strike, some charges dropped for others

Hillsboro, N.C.

Four persons have been acquitted and some charges dropped against seven others in connection with the 31-day strike by food service workers at the University of North Carolina in Chapel Hill.

Orange County District Court Judge Harry Horton gave out sentences here ranging from 30 days to six months to six persons involved in a clash with police during picketing at the university.

Howard Fuller, Anthony Belcher and Thomas Greyson all were acquitted of engaging in a riot, disorderly conduct and failure to disperse. Clyde McPherson was acquitted of the last two charges.

Charges of failure to disperse, interfering with an officer or disorderly conduct were dropped against Larry White, Lonnie Harrison, Jim Howard, George Pyne, John Wheeler, John Thorne and Gene Gore, an AFSCME organizer.

Gore was sentenced to 30 days on two counts of assault and Wheeler to 90 days for blocking a building. Former area director Jim Pierce was given a 90-day suspended sentence for disorderly conduct and fined $300.

Six month sentences. Mrs. Doris Farrington and Jack McLean both were sentenced to six months for assault and Roland Davis was given six months for resisting an officer.

All those sentenced are out on bond pending appeal.

AFSCME organizer Gene Gore (left) and Howard Fuller, a civil rights leader from Durham, N.C., leave Orange County District Court in Hillsboro.

AFSCME will appeal the convictions and is expected to challenge the constitutionality of North Carolina's anti-riot law. Many of the charges were brought under the new law.

An International attorney said the trumped-up charges were an attempt to break up the union-community coalition between Local 1987 at the university and civil rights groups in Chapel Hill who supported the walkout last November and December.

Fifteen persons were arrested during picketing. Police wielding nightsticks and carrying shotguns clashed with pickets and student sympathizers outside one of the dining halls on campus. Several persons were taken to North Carolina Memorial Hospital for treatment of cuts and head injuries.

Local wins strike. The local won the strike against SAGA Food Service Inc. and was granted recognition and dues checkoff. Some 250 workers were involved in the dispute and were strongly supported by students and civil rights organizations in the Chapel Hill area.

A massive student demonstration to support the strikers was scheduled the day the walkout ended.

WANTED: Housekeepers and laundry workers, Boston City Hospital, weekly salary $37.75.

That ad could have run in the Boston Globe in 1953. That was the kind of salary made by people who worked at entry level hospital jobs. That was also the year AFSCME organized Boston City Hospital.

Things are a little different now. People in entry level jobs are making close to $100-a-week to start. Boston Council 45 has 22 negotiated pay ranges with the city's Dept. of Health and Hospitals. The top is $328.25-a-week to start as an engineer.

Boston is not an isolated example of how hospital workers' wages have been improved by organization and collective bargaining. Here are a few others:

Louisiana—Wages have risen 52-cents-an-hour since Council 17 organized all state hospitals, including the huge Charity Hospital in New Orleans. AFSCME is now asking for an additional 28-cents-an-hour.

New York City—Collective bargaining by Council 37 started in the city's municipal hospitals in 1966. Wages for lowest paid employees will be $2,000-a-year higher this July. Bargaining for nurse's aides started in January, 1967. The wage scale will be $1,800 to $2,400-a-year higher this July. Twenty % of the aides get $300 to $425-a-year differential for skilled supervisory responsibility.

Memphis—City of Memphis hospitals were organized by Local 1733 in 1968. By July, minimum wages will have been increased by 70-cents-an-hour.

Still in race. The figures show that hospital workers, at least in some areas, have managed to stay in the annual race between wages and the cost-of-living. It does not mean that hospital workers, as a national work force, are well paid. Hospitals, the official magazine of the American Hospital Association, said in a recent issue:

". . . despite the large increases of recent years, hospital employees still earn considerably less than employees in many other sectors of the economy. The average annual salary of hospital employees is still lower than salaries for teachers, manufacturing workers and construction workers."

The magazine said the average annual salary of employees in all community hospitals in the United States went from $3,639 in 1963 to $4,919 in 1968.

This year, the Federally-defined poverty level is $3,900-a-year for a family of four. It means many hospital workers are one step ahead of what the government considers living in poverty.

It has been estimated that 2.8 million people were working in health occupations in 1966, with two-thirds of them in hospitals. The figure is expected to exceed 3 million this year and be close to 4 million by 1975. Health services may well be the leading industry in employment in the nation before the end of this decade.

Courtesy expected. These are the people who will take care of you and your family in case of sickness, accident or just a routine check-up. They will be expected to be courteous, concerned and well-trained.

Aside from doctors and nurses, most of them will be behind the scenes, making sure of things often taken for granted—clean linen, clean surroundings, properly prepared meals served on time, etc. Chances are you won't think about how much they make a week.

Others are thinking about it.

In a speech prepared for the American Management Association in New York last year, AFSCME President Jerry Wurf said to the delegates:

"You know the conditions that prevail (in hospitals). You know the miserable pay levels. You know the working conditions. You know the tremendous employee turnover."

New York Exposé. Many of the working conditions Wurf mentioned once were widespread in the New York City municipal hospitals. These conditions, along with the negligence, waste and corruption of hospitals and the hospital bureaucracy itself was brought to the public's attention in 1967 by District Council 37 in the Public Employee Press.

The newspaper told, and showed, how workers in one hospital kitchen had to wear boots because of stagnant water on the floor, water that had been there 18 months because of broken pipes. The floor was rotted.

There were examples of filthy, unsanitary and dangerous health hazards because of infestation by pigeons, roaches and mice. In one hospital, workers on one shift fought with workers on another shift for linen. The group that lost didn't have clean pillow cases for many areas, including the contagion wards.

The AFSCME exposé was quickly followed up by the public media—radio, television and newspapers. The New York Times ran four stories, corresponding to each of the four issues of the Public Employee Press.

Mayor John Lindsay toured the hospitals and immediately pledged a cleanup. He carried it out.

The stories had dramatically made their point—how the terrible conditions had affected patients, who were mostly the poor, and the employees, who were mostly AFSCME members.

Workers concerned. Wages and working conditions are only part of it. Hospital workers are concerned about the same things that bother other union members—grievance procedure, seniority rights and fringe benefits.

Like other public employees, any attempt at organizing or collective bargaining in governmental hospitals must come in an atmosphere clouded by state laws.

Wurf was chairman of the Maritime Trades Dept. Study Committee that issued a report on Collective Bargaining in the Public Sector to the AFL-CIO's Eighth Constitutional Convention last fall. Part of the report said:

Anti-strike laws. "In every state where there are bargaining laws, and in states without bargaining laws, prohibitions against strikes exist. At least 38 states have officially prohibited strikes by public employees through laws, court decisions and attorneys' general decisions."

These laws have not stopped public employees from organizing for a decent wage and working conditions. This includes hospital workers.

But organizing problems are more complex among hospital employees because of the very nature of the institutions. Workers are scattered in various buildings and often work unusual shifts.

The number of jobs and people are limited only by the size of the hospital. There are some very big hospitals where various groups of workers have little in common during a routine work day.

In recent years, however, thousands of hospital workers have banded together to bargain collectively. Why? Because there are common denominators for all hospital workers, no matter what their jobs. "They want status, dignity and money," said one AFSCME official.

OSPITAL WORK

A constant effort to catch up on wages and working conditions

One of the main points for unionized workers is job security.

Most important. "Job security is the most important thing," said the Rev. James Smith of Local 1733 in Memphis. "At one time a supervisor could fire a person for not wearing his hair right. Wages are important but job security is more important than anything."

Louisiana Council 17 Director Willie Long says the same thing in a different way. "Grievance procedure is one of the main things in organizing," he said. "That and a promotion policy."

Boston Council 45 Director Joseph Bonavita agrees.

"Before grievance procedure you operated at the whim and caprice of a supervisor. If he didn't like you, it was out the door."

Despite the organizing problems, AFSCME's growth in hospital workers has been as fast as the growth of the union itself in recent years.

Today, it is estimated that one out of every five AFSCME members is a hospital employee.

Locals in 32 states. The union has 266 locals representing hospital workers in 32 states, the District of Columbia and Puerto Rico. The membership concentration is heaviest in 12 states—New York, Michigan, Massachusetts, Illinois, Missouri, Minnesota, Pennsylvania, California, Indiana, Oregon, Wisconsin and Ohio.

Yet the vast majority of hospital employees are without a union—and the benefits that unionism brings through collective bargaining strength.

The latest annual survey (1968) for hospitals accredited by the American Hospital Association shows: 559 state hospitals, 893 county, 348 city and 73 city-county. That's 2,173 hospitals with a total working force of 661,821. This force does not include residents, interns or students.

And yet the demand for hospital workers always seems to exceed the supply. Harry I. Greenfield, associate professor of economics at Queens College, City University of New York said last year:

Worker shortage. "Few if any major industries or professions in the United States suffer from such a persistent or serious shortage of skilled personnel as the health care field. Training programs sponsored by various professional associations are an important source of new health workers. However, the educational requirements for entry tend to be high. These requirements should be lowered wherever possible."

Writing in Manpower Magazine, the official monthly journal of the Manpower Administration, U.S. Dept. of Labor, Professor Greenfield said there were limits to the use of less-trained personnel to free professionals for their special skills, "but it appears that in health services these limits have not yet been approached."

In a related article, Dr. Seymour Wolfbein of Temple University was asked who would do "menial chores" if everyone is going to be trained for good jobs with good futures. He answered:

"Lots of people are willing to do the work. There is nothing wrong with collecting garbage and doing similar tasks as long as you don't call them menial and as long as you pay people well and give them a chance to move ahead. Right here in the Temple University Hospital we had 75% turnover every year among hospital attendants.

"Why not?" he continued. "They were low paid and where do you go after you're old and a hospital attendant. Nowhere. Now we've cut turnover in half, in good part by providing job ladders. There are now people who start as hospital attendants and end up as dietitians. We increase their salaries and give them prospects for advancement."

Career Ladders. Job, or Career Ladders, has become a familiar term with AFSCME in the last year, especially as it pertains to hospital workers. The union knew this was a way to move lower-paying employees into meaningful hospital careers, like Dr. Wolfbein's hospital attendants.

The Career Ladder is the heart of AFSCME's Hospital Career Development Program, the first such over-all project undertaken by a labor organization for municipal hospital workers.

Prior to the career development program, Council 37 in New York City started its Nurse's Aide to Licensed Practical Nurse Upgrading Program. Both programs had the same idea—train people now working in hospitals and upgrade them to a better job.

Council 37 Associate Director Lillian Roberts explained her program simply:

Chance to advance. "Employees who had demonstrated their dedication by serving in the hospitals for years, and who had acquired basic skills by doing professional work, deserved the opportunity for advancement that additional training could give them."

The trainee scorecard: Of the 463 who enrolled, 422 graduated. There were 41 dropouts for academic or non-academic reasons. Of the graduates, 259 are now licensed practical nurses and 163 are awaiting licensure by the state.

Hospital employees across the land are finding that they can best serve themselves by joining with others—by combining their strength through unionism.

NYC order boosts local's membership

New York

The city's Office of Collective Bargaining has ordered that 624 workers of the Human Resources Administration (HRA) be included in District Council 37. The new members have become a chapter of Local 371, Social Service Employees Union, and negotiators are working on an initial contract.

The local already had a strong organizing drive going when the city board ordered certification. Local 371 had petitioned, based on similarity of jobs, that the workers be included.

New HRA titles in the local now include aides, technicians, senior technicians, specialist trainees, specialist and supervising specialist. Their jobs range from community work to auditing.

City employees in Lewiston, Me., have voted 82 to 9 to be represented by District Council 74.

Those who voted included non-teaching employees in the schools, non-uniformed workers in the police and fire departments and public workers department employees.

The election was conducted by Miss Marion E. Martin, commissioner of the Maine Dept. of Labor and Industry. AFSCME was represented by International Representative David Chisholm, Council Treasurer H. George Poulin and Frank Hillman, council business agent.

Town Employees of Wethersfield, Conn., have voted for AFSCME representation in a run-off with another union. Town officials campaigned hard for a "no union" vote. The members will join Local 1303 and includes town hall employees and garage and maintenance workers.

Connecticut Council 4 was successful in its efforts to represent highway employees in Thompson, Conn. An official of the State Labor Relations Board certified the authenticity of signatures on a petition to recognize AFSCME after meeting with local officials and Lawrence Cacciola, deputy director of Council 4.

New Jersey Council 1 has won recognition for 467 new members at Lakeland Institutions in Camden County. The blue collar workers, including hospital attendants and food service, will be members of Local 1965. The election was conducted by the state's Public Employees Relations Commission. AFSCME is also organizing craft workers at the institutions.

Michigan Council 55 has been certified by the Michigan Labor Mediation Board as representative of all custodial-maintenance employees of the Lansing Community College, excluding supervisors.

The board also certified Council 55 as representative for the Montgomery Sheriff's Dept. after deputies unaninously voted for AFSCME.

Michigan Council 23 won representation for all supervisors in the Data Processing Dept. of the Board of Education, Macomb County Intermediate Schools. In a separate election involving the same school board, Council 23 won representation for all full and part-time employees and secretaries in the same department.

Council 24, the Wisconsin State Employees Association, has won recognition elections for workers in the Dept. of Public Instruction. The election was conducted by the Wisconsin Employment Relations Commission. Council 24 won the election over the Wisconsin Education Association in a separate unit for classroom teachers at the Wisconsin School for the Deaf at Delavan and the School for the Visually Handicapped at Janesville.

Employees of the Montana State Prison at Deer Lodge have voted more than 2-to-1 to affiliate with Montana State Council 9. The voting was monitored by Tony Softich, assistant commissioner of the Montana Dept. of Labor and Industry. The vote was 101 to 48 out of the 172 employees eligible to cast ballots.

State report raps Arkansas for 'poverty' level wages

Little Rock, Ark.

Salaries for some state employees in Arkansas are so low that 13 workers in the Welfare Dept. are eligible for welfare.

State Welfare Commissioner Len E. Blaylock, who cited the plight of welfare workers in the Little Rock, Gazette, said his department was understaffed and just trying to "hold things together."

Blaylock's remarks, along with others, were a reaction to a report that said salaries of nearly 1,000 state employees caused "poverty living standards" for many workers, created an exodus from state jobs and plunged morale to "an all-time low."

The newspaper recently printed highlights of the report, compiled by the Labor Standards Committee of the Governor's Commission on the Status of Women. The report was submitted to Gov. Winthrop Rockefeller and mailed to state legislators.

Jeanne Lambie heads committee. The committee chairman was Mrs. Jeanne Lambie, president of AFSCME Council 38 in Arkansas.

She said 2,400 of the more than 14,000 state employees draw less than $3,600 a year—the poverty level under Federal guidelines. Mrs. Lambie added that Arkansas has 840 workers receiving hourly wages under $1.60 an hour, the Federal minimum wage.

The Gazette said "Much of the blame for the low salaries is attributed to the job classification and compensation plan for state employees adopted as Act 199 by the General Assembly last Spring."

The report said:

"Our general findings show that state employees and their families are adversely affected by the current pay plan and that conditions will become worse, not better, if the state continues to apply the present unrealistic salary plan as a base for state employment."

Lowest paid workers. Citing Federal Commerce Dept. statistics, the report said state workers in Arkansas, in 1968, were the lowest paid state employees in the nation. The Federal statistics showed the 1968 average pay for 14,204 non teaching state workers was $346 a month—$198 a month below the national average and $42 behind 49th ranked Mississippi.

The report charged that 17 of 22 employees in one unidentified agency held two jobs to support their families. Salaries in this agency are $243 to $274 a month.

State agencies have lost 610 employees since the new salary plan went into effect. The report said agency heads are having a difficult time recruiting employees for all job classifications because of low salary schedules "which are 30% to 40% lower than salaries for comparable occupations in business and industry."

(The Wall Street Journal recently ran a story which said state, county and city governments are short about one million workers across the country and cited the main reason as low pay.)

Recommendations. The commission's report made these recommendations to Gov. Rockefeller and the legislature:

- A "more realistic salary structure" for state employees be adopted "as soon as possible."
- Pay raises or promotion should be automatic "and not dependent upon the discretion of the department head."
- Persons in the lowest paid jobs should have a chance to advance to higher pay positions more rapidly.
- Annual "cost of living" increases be implemented "to keep salaries current with economic changes."
- A "review board" be created for workers to air grievances about their jobs and salaries. The board, to be comprised of representatives from all employee classifications and minority groups, would weigh the legitimacy of the grievances and make recommendations to the administrators of the dissatisfied employees' departments.

International General Representative Pete Moralis receives an award from Dr. Lillie M. Jackson, president of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, Baltimore Chapter.

Moralis honored

Baltimore

The Baltimore Chapter of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People has presented an award to International General Representative Pete Moralis of Baltimore for helping an ex-soldier get a job while he awaited the outcome of a jury trial and an appeal to the Veterans Administration.

Wallace Beauford won both the acquittal and the appeal. He credited Moralis with getting him a job with the city's Bureau of Recreation even though he had not been exonerated at the time.

In 1965, Beauford was enroute to his home here after being discharged from the Army. He had to change buses in Philadelphia. The bus pulled off and left him. Beauford complained about the driver.

The police stepped in and there was a fight. Beauford was kicked in the face and lost the sight of his right eye. He was charged with 15 counts of assault on a police officer.

He was acquitted on all counts by a Philadelphia jury. The Veterans Administration, however, turned down his request for benefits for loss of the eye. The ruling was appealed and the Board of Veterans Appeals granted Beauford a lump sum of about $5,000 plus $137 per month. Still pending is a $650,000 suit against the city of Philadelphia.

New Democratic president

Mrs. Lila Henderson, recording secretary for AFSCME Council 11 in Akron, Ohio, is the new president of the Federated Democratic Women's Clubs of Summit County. She is also president of the Ohio Federated Democratic Women's Club. Mrs. Henderson, a 54-year-old mother of five, once helped organize cafeteria workers at a Navy shipyard in Wilmington, Del., and is a member of AFSCME Local 1229, Court House Chapter, in Akron. She says her first goal in the new job is to organize the 25 affiliated women's clubs into a strong, cohesive political network.

School workers pay hiked by $500-$600

Non-professional employees of the Middle Country School District No. 1 here will receive wage increases of between $500 and $600 under a new contract signed by Local 1938.

The contract also includes a $25 uniform allowance for cafeteria workers, a 5-cent hourly night differential, additional paid holidays bringing the total to 13½ days per year and three personal leave days a year.

Workers will get 12 months paid sick leave after three years employment and union negotiators worked out a grievance procedure with final and binding arbitration.

The contract was negotiated by Local President John Santerillo, Business Manager Daniel Birecree and International Representative Ernie Rewolinski.

Public Employee Unions

PUBLIC-EMPLOYE BARGAINING gets more attention in state legislatures.

The number of states with laws guaranteeing public employes some bargaining rights grows to 19 from 14 at the start of 1969, according to Public Service Associates, Washington labor relations consultants. Pennsylvania's Senate is expected to act soon on its version of a House-passed bill that would give public workers other than firemen and police a limited right to strike. A new Montana law lets nurses strike if there's no other walkout of nurses within 150 miles.

Yet the rising militancy among public employes may catch some states napping. A Public Service Associates official claims that "only a handful" of state laws are capable of preventing strikes through collective bargaining. Two key problems: The lack of fact-finding procedures to resolve impasses and the existence of strike penalties so harsh they're impractical.

Teachers Union president David Selden, currently in jail for picketing during the Newark, N.J., school strike, sees his sentence as a way of dramatizing the need for improved bargaining laws.

COLLEGE ADMINISTRATORS grow younger on many Eastern campuses.

The rapid expansion of staffs, the need to relate to militant students, mounting job pressures frequently result in hiring of men in their twenties and thirties. The University of Pennsylvania's dean of admissions is 32. At Washington's Georgetown University, the dean of freshmen and the dean of the summer school are both 29. Princeton's dean of students is 34, its provost 36.

"There just aren't enough old people to go around," says Arthur Doyle, Boston College's 27-year-old admission dean. A top New York University official observes, "Administrators have to be prepared to go around the clock these days." The trend to younger campus officials is less evident in the Midwest and Far West. "Education is by its very nature an institution run by elders," frets a disenchanted 36-year-old administrator at a small state college in California.

In some cases, college officials say, the young administrator is also black.

SHOULD YOUR TEACHER STRIKE?

Public Employee Unions

FIREMAN?
SANITATION MAN?
POLICEMAN?)

A teaching unit on rights of public employees

Introduction

Nearly one of every six workers in the United States today is employed directly by the government.

You know many of them. Teachers, principals, custodians, and other educational workers make up the biggest chunk. Leave your school and you find more: the policeman on the corner beat, a census taker, a clerk at the post office, your mailman, a fireman, a museum guide, a nurse, a social worker, the lifeguard at the beach.

Altogether, there are 12.5 million public workers in the country, out of a total work force of just over 80 million. In most respects, they're like all the other workers in the U.S.—they perform useful services or provide necessary products, they get paid for their work, and they have bosses.

But in one major respect, they're different. They usually can't bargain for wages and working conditions in the same way that privately employed workers can, and they almost never have the legal right to strike.

This teaching unit examines the rights of public workers. It was conceived during what most certainly has been the greatest upsurge of militancy among public workers in the nation's history. In the past several months, the city of San Francisco was virtually shut down by public-employees' strikes, the air traffic controllers' actions seriously curtailed transportation, mail was delayed by postal strikes, and, of course, teacher strikes continued unabated. The past few months have also seen rising reaction by government: AFT President David Selden and 200 teachers in Newark, N.J., all of whom violated an ex parte anti-strike injunction, were sentenced to up to six months in prison. The federal government called out troops to keep the post offices functioning. Congressmen reacted to a threatened walkout by District of Columbia teachers by postponing action on a teacher-pay bill. Air traffic controllers were summoned to court for contempt proceedings. Threats have been made to fire the firemen.

This teaching unit—prepared by labor historian Will Scoggins at the AFT's request—ought to capitalize on the interest aroused by all these recent events, and promote class discussions on the rights of public workers. It is not a one-sided presentation, nor is it a programmed, here's-how-to-do-it, ready-made plan that you can take into your class and start using immediately. It requires that you do some reading, some homework, and some creative lesson planning of your own. It is divided into three suggested lessons, preceded by an overview. Each lesson has its own goals, suggestions for class discussions, and some proposed activities. You may wish to introduce the unit by dissecting a recent teachers' strike in your district or a nearby district, or by talking about the postal strikes or other strikes of public workers that have directly affected your students.

However you use it, we'd like to hear from you. How did you build on this unit? How did your students respond? Let us know. We'll share the most interesting experiences with American Teacher readers in a future issue. And, if you'd like more copies of this teaching unit to share with non-AFT members, please write to us. We'll be happy to send you more.

Overview

BACKGROUND FOR TEACHERS

It is a matter of public record—via polls, newspapers and letters from readers of newspapers, scholarly studies, and television interviews, as well as our own experience in our classroom—that there exists a great deal of misinformation, prejudice, and outright hostility concerning the organization of workers into unions and their subsequent collective action to improve their lot. Why this should be so is not the immediate subject of this teaching unit. That the negative attitudes exist, however, and that the hositility seems greater toward workers in the public sector (garbage collectors, municipal bus drivers, postmen, teachers) when their actions necessitate a slowdown or interruption of services than when workers in the private sector do the same thing, should be known to every teacher. He can then begin to prepare himself to deal with it and attempt to dissipate the hostility and correct the misinformation.

LABOR-HISTORY UNIT

We assume that the teacher—especially a teacher of social studies—already presents a relatively comprehensive unit on the over-all subject of labor-management history and of the protagonists' relations with each other. Such a unit stresses the changes in the nature of employment resulting from the industrial revolution and the organization of capital within the corporate structure into larger and larger units to defend its interests within the economy.

The teacher need not shrink from the clearly documented violence of the clash between labor and management that marks much of American history from 1870 to 1940. After all, it is nothing short of illusion to believe that the interests of the contesting groups are the same, or necessarily even complementary. The adversary relationship does exist. However, the teacher might be wise, especially given the treatment of most U.S. history textbooks concerning this violence, to demonstrate that the collision of interests was only a part of the over-all working-out of the concept of industrial democracy, the rights of workers to the protection of their lives and skills, and a way of guaranteeing them as well as their employers an adequate share of the wealth that they, jointly, have created.

The teacher might also present a more comprehensive treatment than is found in most textbooks of the importance of the three major federal laws governing the maturing relationship between labor and management. The Wagner Act (1935), the Taft-Hartley Act (1947), and the Landrum-Griffin Act (1959) have spelled out in detail the rights as well as responsibilities of the contestants and have provided the machinery whereby the overwhelming majority of conflicts can be resolved peacefully.

COLLECTIVE BARGAINING

The most important method, and one that although no longer unique to America was an American innovation, is that of collective bargaining. The Labor-Management Relations Act as amended defines it simply: (Sec. 8 d) "To bargain collectively is the performance of the mutual obligation of the employer and the representative of the employees to meet at reasonable times and confer in good faith with respect to wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment." A whole course of study might be constructed on the implications of this definition alone!

However, we are dealing in this proposed unit of instruction with a more sophisticated problem. During eighty years of collective action, and finally of law, the relationship between labor and private employers has been worked out fairly explicitly.

A DIFFERENT STORY

The Norris-LaGuardia Act of 1932 guaranteed freedom of organization to workers in private industry. It forbade courts to issue injunctions for a number of union actions, including work stoppages. Before an injunction could be issued, a hearing would have to be held in open court and the finding would have to be that unlawful acts had been threatened and would be committed, that substantial and irreparable damage to property would occur for which there was no adequate remedy at law, or that public officers were unable or unwilling to protect private property.

'NO PLACE' FOR MILITANCY?

But what happens when the worker happens not to be employed by a private corporation, but by a public agency—a government, federal, state, or local, or a school board? President Franklin D. Roosevelt gave his answer thusly in 1937: "The process of collective bargaining, as usually understood, cannot be transplanted into the public service. . . . The employer is the whole people who speak by means of laws enacted by their representatives in Congress. . . . Particularly, I want to emphasize my conviction that militant tactics have no place in the functions of any organization of government employees."

Moreover, Congress purposely excluded federal employees from coverage under the Wagner Act of 1935 and the Taft-Hartley Act of 1947. Furthermore, Public Law 330 of 1955 makes it a felony for federal employees to strike or even assert the right to strike.

The issue raised here is the age-old one of the sovereignty of the state, or more precisely, of the government. It has been asserted that sovereignty, in practice, finds expression in the processes of making decisions accompanied by authority, decisions regarded as binding on the community and ultimately enforceable. Would not the extension of negotiable rights to employees of the sovereign thereby diminish sovereignty itself? And since, theoretically, in a democratic state the sovereignty rests ultimately with the people, then would not the extension of those rights result in a sacrifice of the rights of the people, or a collision with the "public interest?"

As sticky as this logic may appear, the events of history continue, and the facts and figures accumulate. If the 1930s was the decade of the blue-collar worker, then the just-completed 1960s was certainly that of the public employee. At the federal, state, and local levels of government, employees are in fact organizing, engaging in negotiations, and voicing grievances against their employers.

The American Federation of State, County, and Municipal Employees, AFL-CIO, has 373,000 members. The American Federation of Government Employees, AFL-CIO, has 263,000. The two large postal unions, both affiliated with the AFL-CIO, have a combined membership of over 300,000 and have only recently demonstrated their militancy. In short, these workers are beginning to act just like all other employees.

HALF IN EDUCATION

And the figures of growth are almost staggering. Today, approximately one out of every six nonagricultural employees is on the public payroll. By 1975, by current growth predictions, 15 million people will work for some kind of government with the preponderance of growth continuing at the state and local levels. Between 1955 and 1965, state and local government employment increased by 65 percent while federal employment showed only a 13-percent gain. And, very important, about half of all state and local government employees work in education!

What shall be the relationship of all these millions of people with the sovereign, their employer? The answer at present is muddy and will probably not become completely clear for some time. It must be pointed out that sovereignty itself is not necessarily something abstractly fixed in a permanent place. Kings, as sovereigns, once ruled by divine right. No longer, at least in western countries.

Do public workers have to stay on the job despite 'intolerable and dangerous' conditions?

The state itself, as seen by Hegel as an organic whole, a living, breathing, pulsating thing, is now under intensive scrutiny. Sovereignty, then, may no longer be considered as a "ghostly thing," but as a process. Political Scientist Andrew Hacker has defined it as, "the interaction of specified individuals and institutions according to specified rules of procedure. . . . The process of sovereignty, therefore, is more concerned with how laws are passed than with what they say." Herewith, sovereignty becomes flexible, not fixed, and a real, not abstract, relationship.

This whole knotty issue was given significant clarification by President John F. Kennedy's Executive Order 10988, of Jan. 17, 1962. The impetus of the order was to spell out conditions of recognition of employee organizations in the federal service.

FEDERAL POLICIES

Prior to 1962, unions existed in federal employment, but nobody knew what rights and obligations they had. Executive Order 10988 filled that gap and also pointed out to unions and management at the state and local levels that regulatory machinery could be mutually helpful. It not only spelled out a clear-cut policy on the right of employees to organize, to have their organizations accorded official recognition, but it provided for consultation in the establishment of personnel policies and procedures and, under specified conditions, for negotiated agreements with agency management on working conditions.

Following the lead of President Kennedy, by mid-1969, 19 states had authorized by law some form of collective bargaining with state or municipal employees, or both. And 1,200,000 federal employees had exclusive representatives in some 1,800 units.

On Oct. 29, 1969, President Richard M. Nixon issued Executive Order 11491 superseding the Kennedy order. Under the Nixon order, a central authority consisting of the chairman of the Civil Service Commission, the Secretary of Labor, and officials from the President's executive office, named the Federal Labor Relations Council, will administer the program. The Assistant Secretary of Labor for Labor-Management Relations is given additional power, such as authority to supervise the required secret-ballot elections and to determine the recognized unit. A Federal Service Impasse Panel is also established. It has authority to settle impasses in contract negotiation if other means fail. The exclusive representative will have the same negotiating rights as under the Kennedy order (importantly, matters determined by Congress are still excluded from the negotiations, e.g., pay, hours, leave). In addition, a new form of recognition has been created: national consultation rights. This designation will go to organizations that represent a "substantial" number of employees in an agency, but will not apply where an organization already holds exclusive recognition at the national level.

So, with an increasingly elaborate federal system of negotiation, and with 18 states having laws requiring the public employer to bargain with at least some state or local government employees, it would appear that the question of public employees' rights to organize and bargain in their own interest would be settled. Not so. There are still many restrictions on their rights to do so. The question of the "public interest" is still open to interpretation between the two contestants and frequently results in the public agency being able to obtain a court injunction to make sure that its particular service is not interrupted.

THE "RIGHT" TO STRIKE

The use of injunctions in public-employee strikes is increasingly viewed as an impediment to true collective bargaining. In Michigan, the state supreme court in 1968 (in a case involving Holland, Mich., teachers) upheld a refusal to enjoin a strike unless a clear and present danger to public health and safety was involved. A teacher strike, the court said, presented no such danger. Few other states, however, have moved as far as Michigan in this regard, although public opinion appears to be growing increasingly favorable.

It has been charged that enjoinment of a public-employee strike, such as a teacher strike, has the effect of forcing workers to stay on the job despite what may be intolerable and dangerous conditions. Teachers in Newark, N.J., for example, were driven to the last resort of striking early in 1970. The court issued an ex parte injunction, which means only one side presented its case to the judge, and the result was that 192 teachers were sentenced to jail terms and fines for not going back to work. The injunction included penalties against "aiding and abetting" the strikers, so that AFT President David Selden, who walked on a picket line, was sentenced to three months in jail for contempt of court.

Skirting the issue of the right of public employees to strike, just because it may be "explosive," is comparable, some people think to avoiding other basic issues of fundamental importance to our society. Legal opinion in most of the United States views a strike against the government as a strike against the sovereignty of the nation, and this is said to be based on the old English common law, the foundation for much of our legal structure.

But while we are clinging to this old "monarchical" approach, the English, for example, are acting quite differently, and they say they are the ones who are following the common law most closely. In a letter to AFT President Selden recently, W. A. C. Kendall, president of the Association of Teachers in Technical Institutions, a union of vocational teachers in England and Wales, said: "I heard today, with considerable surprise, that you were in prison for pursuing what I would have thought were the quite legitimate aims of a teachers trade union. That the leader of a teachers union can be so treated in the U.S.A. is a matter of considerable surprise to me. We have recently been involved in militant action and I would have been proud to go to prison had it been necessary, but fortunately our law is more liberal."

HISTORICAL BACKGROUND

The first recorded strike occurred about 1170 B.C., when workers at the Necropolis in Thebes walked off their jobs because the government of Egypt had not paid them in two months. (Note, they were public employees.) And on April 13, 1970, the United Teachers of Los Angeles struck because of the long list of unresolved grievances involving the poor state of educational affairs in that city and state.

It would appear, then, that a dilemma is at hand. As stated earlier, the federal government prohibits its employees to strike—but they strike. Most states also prohibit the strike—the people strike. The dilemma has been phrased very well by Heisell and Hallihan in Questions and Answers on Public Employee Negotiation.

"Horn No. 1: Some public services are so vital to the immediate safety of the citizenry that a strike is unthinkable.

"Horn No. 2: Given sufficient stimulus, any group of employees, public or private, essential or nonessential, with or without the legal right to strike, will strike."

It would appear obvious, then, that to legislate against strikes is only to provide punitive tools after the strike has taken place, tools that may or may not be usable. (Can one conceive of arresting 22,000 Los Angeles teachers?) More pertinent, it seems to us, would be adequate machinery to solve grievances so that the strike would become less necessary.

'MORE CONSCIENTIOUS'

It is noteworthy that public employees often seem more conscientious about professional standards than are their employers. Social workers have struck to have their caseloads reduced so that they can more effectively service their clients. Nurses and hospital attendants have struck to have more people employed in order to better care for their patients. And, certainly, one of the major demands of the Los Angeles teachers is the reduction of class size so that they can be better teachers.

It is equally important to note that much of the discomfort of public employees has to do with the whole growing "urban crisis." More people in smaller spaces expect more and better services. Family patterns change, forcing public agencies to do what the extended family did, or did not do, before. New thrills, new "kicks," seduce the proliferating urban young. (An official of the United Teachers of Los Angeles has asserted that in 92 percent of the secondary schools of that city drugs are a major problem.) And race relations continue to be extremely abrasive. Public employees, then, often see no way to change the "horse-and-buggy" structure of their employing agencies except to shock them with desperate action.

In any case, the teacher should keep in mind that all of his students in all his classes, 95 percent will shortly become sombody's employees. And increasingly, that employer will be a public agency. We have prepared this teaching unit to help the teacher acquaint his class with what can be expected and what constitutes the problem areas.

Preface: If there has been a recent teacher strike in your district, you may wish to discuss it as a general introduction to this unit. Or, you may want to talk about the postal strike or the air-traffic controllers' work stoppage, or strikes by any group of public workers which have, in some way or another, had a direct effect on your students.

Aim: The teacher should acquaint his high-school students with the changing nature of the economy, from one geared to production and distribution of goods to one of increasing needs for public service. This should not be too difficult since studies reveal that today's young people already sincerely want their life's work to have social importance.

Motivation: It seems to us that the greatest tool for motivation in this case would simply be to present as much concise and valid information as possible about the prospects for public service. Much material is available from public agencies and should be obtained by the teacher, condensed, and presented to his class. Perhaps a representative from the Civil Service Commission, the Department of Public Welfare, or a similar agency can be brought to the class for a presentation. If possible, the teacher should meet with the representative chosen to ascertain his ability in this matter. A poorly prepared or inarticulate spokesman can do great harm to the teacher's class.

Aim: The teacher is aware that much prejudice exists regarding the relationship between employer and employee, particularly organized employees. The aim of this lesson is to reduce this prejudice and dispel myths.

Motivation: Again, it is our conviction that reliable information, effectively presented, does much in this day of the "shuck and jive" to motivate young people to want to learn. If the teacher can find an effective representative of the American Federation of Government Employees or the American Federation of Teachers, he might profitably use that person to address his class.

Concepts to be developed:

1. America is a land where individual dignity goes hand in hand with collective strength. The individual, standing alone, is increasingly helpless in the face of complex social stresses and needs.

2. The self-sufficient entrepreneur is rare. The overwhelming majority of Americans are somebody's employees.

3. Historically, employees have organized and joined employee associations or labor unions for four reasons.

A. Economic: Employers, whether private or public, are interested in keeping costs down. Employees, facing ever-increasing costs of living as needs grow, have strength to bargain only if they can approach their employer with united effort.

B. Psychological: The lone worker, perhaps performing routine tasks and far removed from authority, can find himself dehumanized—a little cog in a huge machine—and his personality damaged. Organization offers him protection from the martinet supervisor and it provides him with a sense of importance.

C. Social: The origin of the custom of calling fellow union members "brother" or "sister" is not mysterious. The gathering together of people of common interests is as old as history. It is comfortable to "belong" to something.

D. Political: Most social progress—land reform, public education, workmen's compensation, social security—has been the result of political action. The union as a political organism is a fact of life. It is an instrument for achieving social change.

tween employer and employee. Whatever employees gain, either economically or in prestige, surely must come directly or indirectly at the expense of the employer. There is nothing inherently "wrong" with this relationship and it need not be acrimonious or hateful. Indeed, within the framework of law, and with strong and honest contestants, the conflict of interest can be routinized to the advantage of both. It is generally when one of the contestants is overwhelmingly strong and the other hopelessly weak that, in desperation, violence occurs.

Aim: In this lesson, the teacher must deal with the "nuts and bolts" of labor-management relations. He will define common terms, discuss methods used in resolving conflicts, and analyze the law on the matter.

Motivation: At this stage, given the controversial nature of the subject, motivation and interest should be relatively high. A Socratic questioning approach might be used. (And, remember, the rhetorical question is not an academic crime!) Also, simulated bargaining might be used if the class generally is a bright one. Serious role-playing can be an excellent learning tool.

Current events: Daily newspapers are carrying stories of strikes by teachers and other public workers. You may wish to discuss the issues in the following strikes, their effects on the public, and the results for the workers. You can get information from general news publications, this and past issues of the American Teacher, and from public-employee unions (see Page A-6 for addresses).

a. San Francisco "general" strike
b. Newark teachers strike
c. Los Angeles teachers strike
d. Air traffic controllers' action
e. Postal strikes
f. Nurses' strikes (Michigan and elsewhere)

Explicit definitions of terms:

a. collective bargaining
b. bargaining unit
c. agency shop
d. union shop
e. exclusive recognition
f. consultation rights
g. union security
h. dues check-off
i. steward
j. fringe benefits
k. grievance procedures
l. "good faith"
m. mediation
n. arbitration
o. disciplinary action
p. "militancy"
q. injunction, ex parte injunction
r. The union
   1. local
   2. national
   3. International
   4. central labor council
s. public worker
t. government agency
u. civil service
v. profit-making corporation
w. Executive Orders 10988 and 11491
x. strike and lockout
y. scabs and strikebreakers
z. "health and safety"

Questions to be asked:

1. Why do employees always want "more?"
2. What is the difference between "cost of living" and "standard of living?"
3. What is the importance of President Kennedy's Executive Order 10988 and of President Nixon's Executive Order 11491?
4. Is there a difference between the way public and private employees are treated by law? Should statutes be used to deal with recognizing or not recognizing organizations of public employees?
5. Should the same statutes be used to cover all employees— teachers, policemen, firemen, sanitation workers, supervisors—or should different laws be used for different classifications of employees?
6. What guidelines, if any, should the law contain for the determination of bargaining units?
7. Should the law define "unfair practices" and prohibit them?
8. Should the legislature permit an "agency shop" agreement in public employment?
9. What terms and conditions of employment, if any, should be excluded from the bargaining process?
10. Are special provisions needed to protect civil-service rules and authority where they exist?
11. Should strikes be prohibited? For all workers? For all public workers, regardless of their work? If so, how? If not, should there be conditions imposed by law before a strike can be called by public workers?
12. Should compulsory arbitration be adopted in the public service as a means of resolving impasses in collective bargaining?

Summary: The teacher should attempt to tie up loose ends of the discussion, pointing out areas where there is no common agreement as well as where consensus seems possible. He should make certain to point out that the whole subject of public-worker organization is presently in an evolving state and that all conclusions should be tentative. He should, of course, take special care to sweep away as many cobwebs of mythology as possible. Let his students go forth with at least an open mind on the subject.

1. This represents "after-tax pay" (social security and federal income taxes deducted) with allowance for price changes from the 1957-59 base period, i.e. inflation as measured by the Consumer Price Index.

Suggestions for class activities

(These suggestions are general enough to be adapted to almost any grade level or group of students. Teachers should feel free to expand and build on them.)

Mock bargaining sessions: Some students can take the role of either a school board or other government agency, while others take the role of teachers, firemen, policemen, sanitation workers, etc. Both sides can privately draw up bargaining demands and counter offers and then participate in a series of mock bargaining sessions.

Debates: Classroom debates can be built around the pros and cons of public-worker strikes. One suggested issue: "Resolved: That public workers shall have the right to strike in cases which do not constitute a clear-and-present danger to public health and safety."

Research: Students can check Dept. of Labor reports, etc., to discover the extent of public-employee work stoppages in the past decade, the number of employees involved, the attitudes of the public, etc.

Reports: Students can write compositions or reports on the use of injunctions in the private sector, on anti-injunction legislation, on public-employee strikes in other countries, etc.

Interviews: Students may wish to interview rank-and-file members and leaders of public-worker unions, judges who have invoked injunctions against public employees, city officials, and school officials, and then report on their interviews to the class.

Writing a contract: The teacher and the students may wish to write a collective-bargaining contract with each other (this has been done in some classrooms, see American Teacher, October, 1967). The contract may cover classroom conditions, individualized and independent study, grading policies, and other educational matters.

Picket-line support: Students should be given the opportunity to march on a picket line with public employees, if a strike occurs in your neighborhood and if students decide they want to support the strikers. They can make picket signs (a good sign has bold lettering suitable for TV-camera pickup and with no more than six or seven words). They can be taught picket-line discipline (lines are orderly, they're single file or two abreast, they shouldn't block entrances, and only the "picket captain" should issue statements).

Class discussions: These could include "meet-and-confer" laws as opposed to collective bargaining, the right of public workers to strike in other countries, the definition of "immediate danger to health and safety," etc.

Writing project: What would you do if you were the leader of a teacher union and (a) the school board wouldn't meet with your union; (b) you hadn't received a raise in four years; and (c) class sizes had increased by five students each over the past three years.

Work stoppages by government workers

Work Stoppages Involving Government Workers, 1966, U.S. Bureau of Labor Statistics, 1967:

Total number of work stoppages nationwide in 1966 among governmental workers was greater than the four previous years combined. Of 142 stoppages in the U.S., none was reported by federal employees, nine involved state governments, and 133 were at local government levels:

- 54 were in public schools and libraries
- 36 were in sanitation services
- 19 were in administration and protection services
- 17 were in hospitals and other health services

About 105,000 out of 8.3 million state and local employees were involved. About two days were lost due to stoppages for every 10,000 days worked. (Corresponding ratio for private industry was 19 days in 1966.)

The major issues in 78 stoppages were salaries and related supplementary benefits. In 36 cases, organization and recognition disputes were central, while in 21 cases matters of administration were the principal issue.

Number of teacher strikes in the United States by years: 1880-1940, 20; 1940-1944, 17; 1945-1952, 73; 1953-1962, 20; 1963-65, 16; 1966, 33; 1967, 75; and 1968 (est.) 100+.

Randy H. Hamilton, Exec. Dir., Institute for Local Self Government, reported:

Number of public employee strikes rose from 28 in 1962 to 42 in 1965 and to more than 150 in 1966.

Strikes in the public sector

(The following article is reprinted from "Labor Management Panel," a publication of the Labor-Management School of the University of San Francisco (Vol. 20, No. 3, Jan.-Feb., 1970). Written by Eammon Barrett, editor, it presents a reasoned, dispassionate view of the issue of "strikes in the public sector" and is included in this teaching unit as background reading for the teacher.)

Strikes are becoming more frequent in the public sector despite laws enacted to outlaw them. So commonplace have they become that one wonders about the efficacy of laws outlawing them or the sanctions imposed to prevent them. This introduces the question as to whether or not public employees should be granted the "right" to strike.

VALIDITY OF STRIKES

The right to strike is a natural right which is inherent in human nature. It does not come from the state but rather flows from the dignity and needs of the employees.

The individual laborer has a right to just conditions of employment, and to obtain these objectives, he has a right to join with his fellow workers for the purpose of collective bargaining. The right to strike follows as a corollary from these two rights. Generally speaking, if an objective is good, men may use any legitimate means to obtain this objective since there is no wrong involved in withholding one's work from an employer, even when the act of withholding is concentrated. Actually, the right to withhold work, either as an individual or as a group, is what distinguishes free men from slaves, or distinguishes living under Communist rule from living under a democracy. Consequently, there is nothing immoral in a strike considered in and of itself.

However, what may be good in itself or at least indifferent may become wrong by reason of the end sought or the circumstances involved. Accordingly, certain criteria may be set down by which the morality of a strike may be determined in the concrete. In other words, while the right to strike is natural, it is not absolute.

CRITERIA FOR A JUST STRIKE

The criteria for a just strike are:

1. A just cause;
2. A proportionate cause;
3. A right use of means;
4. A reasonable hope of success.

JUST CAUSE

There must be a just reason for declaring a strike since work stoppages are always attended by some unhappy results, and unless there is a good reason for the stoppage the striker is responsible for whatever harm may follow. Low wages, overwork, or discrimination must be considered as just causes and hence justify what may be called a defensive strike.

The fact that an employer who is able to do so does not pay a living wage (or a wage which enables the employee to rear and educate his children at a level in keeping with his station in life or their economic well-being) constitutes a sufficient reason for a strike. If any form of coercion, either legal or moral, has been used to impose a certain wage on employees—one which is not in keeping with the requirements of their state—then the employees have a just cause for a strike.

However, because of the harm done by a strike to the employees and their families owing to loss of wages, and the sometimes extreme inconvenience caused the public as on the occasion of the New York transit strike, the right to strike should be invoked sparingly and only after workers have made every reasonable attempt to settle their differences by such peaceful means as having recourse to mediation.

The government, as it has done under the Taft-Hartley Act, should devise means of safeguarding the public interest, but not by legislating against a just strike when there is available to employees no other reasonable means of equitable redress, or, in the short-run, no other method of getting the dispute into the public forum so that the people can pass judgment on the issues.

As long as the ban on strikes continues to exist in the public service, two situations are likely to prevail.

The wages in the public sector generally will remain below wages for comparable jobs in the private sector, and working conditions will suffer.

WAGES IN THE PUBLIC SECTOR

A few examples of the relationship between wages and working conditions for comparable employment in the public and private sectors are in order:

1. In 1961 the Department of Research and Retirement of the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees (AFSCME) carried out a study comparing wages in the public sector with wages for similar positions in the private sector. The result of the study was to make it at least arguable that public employees, without the right to strike, do not receive compensation commensurate with the value of their services, or equitable with that received by persons performing comparable work in the private sector. In comparing the average monthly earnings of "production workers in manufacturing" with those of public employees, excluding educational personnel, the study finds that the wages are lower than those of the private workers in 42 jurisdictions and higher in 7, of which California is one.

2. Throughout the State of California, there is no uniformity in police pay from one area to the next despite the fact that the risk to their lives every time they go on duty has increased for all policemen. For example, effective July, 1969, the new San Jose police pay scale includes $944 for an experienced patrolman, with incentive boosts up to $1,016 per month for men with advanced certificates from the State's Peace Officers Standards and Training Commission. Meanwhile, the Vallejo Police after a strike on July 21, 1969, were granted a monthly pay increase from a previous $693 to $841.

3. The nurses' strike in San Francisco in 1966 led to the establishment of a fact-finding commission which found salary inequities and raised pay substantially.

Many disputes are over conditions of employment.

The air traffic controllers were responsible for a nationwide traffic jam on June 18-20, 1969, when they participated in a "sick-call boycott" which is but another name for a strike. The purpose was to draw national attention to the "unsafe" working conditions and work loads, inadequate staff, and unsafe equipment which in turn were endangering the lives of air travelers. More than one news medium reported that in 1969 there were in excess of 300 "near-misses" in the air. As a result of the strike, the Transportation Secretary told the House Commerce Committee that he was setting up a panel of experts headed by John J. Carson, consultant to the Carnegie Foundation and the Urban Coalition, "to review air traffic controller personnel problems." The controllers had been agitating for some time to have something done about the problems of air safety, and yet it took an illegal strike before anything was accomplished. Without the strike, the public would not have known about the possible risks they were running through air travel. It may require a couple of major air tragedies to bring before the public the inadequacy of equipment and unsafe working loads. And, after all, a strike, even an illegal though ethical one, with which many may disagree, is preferable to loss of life. (Some people feel that anti-strike statutes may be unconstitutional.)

From Vallejo we can learn a lesson. The city council protested that it did not have sufficient money to pay increases demanded by the police and firemen and remained adamant on the point despite the fact that police were grossly underpaid relative to many other police forces locally. However, in the fact of a strike, albeit an illegal one, that was backed by many of the citizens, the money was found. Without the strike, all the talk and negotiations in the world would not have won them an increase.

The existence of wage discrepancies and the discrimination on conditions of employment, with both militating against just and equitable treatment for public employees, constitutes a just cause for strike action.

A PROPORTIONATE CAUSE

The second requisite for a just strike is a proportionate cause, that is, the benefits anticipated or hoped for from the strike must be sufficiently great to compensate for the inconveniences which it is likely to produce.

The wrongs which workers are bound to take into consideration before engaging in a work stoppage are not merely those which they themselves may suffer. They must also look to the welfare of others and may not inflict harm on their employers or on the general public to an extent far out of proportion to the advantages they may have set as their goals, even if the demands are just and reasonable.

There is far too much emotionalism regarding the injury that can be suffered by the general public as a result of strikes in such areas as hospitals and fire departments. Even where there have been strikes in these two areas, the employees in question acted with a sense of responsibility and in no way endangered the lives or safety of others. During the June, 1969, Bay Area nurses' strike, the nurses were at pains to minimize any danger to the communities involved. The California Nurses Association promised the hospitals help in handling emergency care. Again, during the mass resignations of nurses in the San Francisco area during 1966, essential services were attended to by nurses who refused to accept pay for those services. The nurses manned emergency stations and gave attention to patients who needed special care. There was a monetary loss to the hospitals, plus the inconvenience experienced by those patients who were obliged to delay entry into the hospital for elective surgery. Emergency and urgent cases were admitted. In both of these nurses' strikes the benefits accruing to the nurses were sufficiently great to compensate for the supposed wrongs which the strike produced. For example, as a result of the June, 1969, strike the nurses who were paid $600 to $800 would get $50 more retroactive to January 1, $40 more in February, 1970; higher premium pay for night work; longer paid vacations and sick leaves; at least every fourth weekend off, and improvements in other benefits. However, it was the promise of a greater voice for nurses in staffing and nursing procedures that finally settled the strike. As long as there was no possibility of a strike, the hospital officials could and actually did remain adamant regarding the concessions made to nurses. Also, the 1966 strike forced the setting up of a fact-finding panel whose members found, on weighing all the evidence, that the nurses were grossly underpaid and recommended a substantial raise in salary for them.

The next example is that of a strike by firemen in a city of over two million population in a country other than the United States. When the strike was first announced there was a deluge of publicity condemning the firemen for irresponsibly endangering the lives and property of the inhabitants. It was taken for granted the firemen would display a complete disregard for the safety of their fellow citizens. Actually, the strike took the form of a refusal to accept wages and a refusal to obey any orders within the confines of the fire station. Other than for those two factors it was duty as usual. They were at work each day and on the alert for fire alarms and always had their equipment ready for any emergency. They answered the usual fire calls, and in the course of fighting one such fire two firemen lost their lives. The tragedy put an end to the propaganda accusing the firemen of being selfish and irresponsible, and in addition it had the effect of convincing the public of the unfairness of the propaganda. The strike was settled immediately, with the firemen being granted the majority of their demands. Other than resorting to strike action, the only short-run remedy open to the firemen was to go on accepting wages lower than that to which they were entitled—either that, or lobby for paternalistic handouts from politicians concerned about their own reelection. Politicians did not wish to jeopardize their chances of reelection by either a tax increase or a change in the allocation of the tax monies. By accepting a wage lower than that to which they were entitled, the firemen could be said to be keeping incumbent politicians in office and thereby discriminating against political opponents who might be more just and less discriminatory.

RIGHT USE OF MEANS

The third requisite for a just strike is a right use of means. Strikes must confine themselves to what is permitted by the natural and civil law. It is difficult to define in detail what is permitted and what is forbidden in this matter. Certainly both physical violence and destruction are forbidden; on the other hand, peaceful picketing is allowed.

REASONABLE HOPE OF SUCCESS

The fourth requisite for a just strike is a reasonable hope of success. In dealing with the strikes in the public sector, two important factors must be taken into consideration:

a) In the first place, strikes are outlawed in the public sector, and in some jurisdictions sanctions are attached to breaking the law. On the face of it, the existence of these laws and sanctions would make it appear that strikes in the public sector would have no reasonable hope of success and thus could not be justified.

b) However, the number of strikes has increased substantially in the last three years, thereby establishing a de facto right to strike.

Many of these strikes have been successful, as seen in the cases of the 1966 and 1968 nurses' strikes in San Francisco, and the police and firemen's strike in Vallejo. In addition, the general duty nurses at Jackson Memorial Hospital in Miami won a 15-percent wage increase as a result of strike action. These examples of success could be multiplied, and in light of this fact it is difficult, if not impossible, to state categorically that future public-employee strikes do not have a reasonable hope of success.

Questions & answers about teacher strikes and injunctions

The following questions and answers are taken from a new American Federation of Teachers publication, "Questions and Answers About Teacher Strikes and Unfair Injunctions," and represents the AFT's view of some of the issues covered in the preceding teaching unit. Copies are available in pamphlet form from the AFT national office, 1012 14th St. N.W., Washington, D.C. 20005. The questions and answers were written by AFT President David Selden while he was serving time in prison during March and April, 1970, for his participation in the Newark, N.J., teachers' strike.

Q: Are strikes by teachers illegal?

A: Yes and no. Many states have laws which prohibit strikes by public employees, including teachers, but even where there is no statute, courts will issue injunctions against striking by teachers if the school boards ask for them. Such injunctions also apply to "aiding and abetting" the strike by teachers or their agents or associates—the union itself, in other words.

Q: Are anti-strike and anti-picketing laws and court rulings unconstitutional?

A: Many legal authorities in the area of civil liberties believe that such laws and rules violate the 1st, 4th, 13th, and 14th Amendments to the United States Constitution, but it is highly doubtful that the Supreme Court would uphold an appeal by teachers at this time.

Q: Must teachers give up the right to strike, then?

A: Absolutely not. The power to strike is absolutely essential for good-faith collective bargaining. If teachers must keep right on working regardless of what the board of education or the superintendent does, there will be no incentive for good-faith bargaining.

Q: Do teachers have the moral right to strike even though the law or a court injunction may forbid it?

A: Yes. Injustice, such as forced labor or involuntary servitude, is morally wrong and refusal to comply with immoral laws or rules is morally justified. Philosophers such as Jefferson, Thoreau, Gandhi, Martin Luther King, Jr., and the late Chief Justice Holmes have set forth this concept many times.

Q: Then the AFT favors strikes by teachers?

A: Nobody "favors" strikes. The AFT favors negotiated contracts covering salaries, fringe benefits, teaching conditions and other matters of concern to teachers and to the children they teach. The AFT favors the right to strike as a guarantee of good-faith bargaining.

Q: Is it true that children lose when teachers strike?

A: Immediately, yes. In the long run, no. That is why AFT locals try to avoid strikes. But, on the other hand, children may suffer more from poor learning conditions, overcrowded classes, and disgruntled teachers than from a strike's temporary interruption of their education. A long-run effect of the strike is improvement of learning and teaching conditions for teachers and children.

Q: How is the injunction used by school boards in a teacher strike?

A: School boards which fail to negotiate in good faith often force teachers to strike. Before teachers actually strike, the board of education can contact a judge who, knowing nothing about the cause of the strike, will issue an injunction without benefit of a hearing on the irrational principle that public employees cannot strike. Once in court, teachers are held in "contempt" for violating the court's injunction and are very often fined and jailed after the strike has been settled to the satisfaction of both parties.

Q: How does the AFT propose to eliminate unfair use of injunctions in teacher-school board disputes?

A: By protest and political action. When a strike is necessary, teachers must be willing to risk the court-imposed penalties which may ensue until the law is changed. AFT President David Selden dramatized the anti-injunction protest by challenging a court order in Newark, New Jersey, and serving a 60-day sentence in the penitentiary. In the meantime, the AFT, in cooperation with the labor movement and other public and private organizations, is mounting a state-by-state campaign of political action.

Q: Can political action succeed in limiting the unfair use of injunctions in teacher bargaining?

A: Yes—but it will not be easy. The support of all teachers, union and non-union, must be solicited. Also, direct help from local unions and central labor bodies and state labor bodies must be sought. Each state should have an "Anti-Injunction" or "Free Collective Bargaining" committee which should include teachers, other union representatives, and public members. The AI or FCB committee should coordinate efforts in each state.

Q: What do you mean by "political action?"

A: Candidates for the legislature should be supported only if they agree to vote for legislation which would limit the use of injunctions and the application of anti-strike laws to only those disputes which constitute a clear and present danger to public safety. In addition to action in primary and final elections of members of the legislature, a strong education and lobbying campaign should be carried on.

Q: Are limiting injunctions and anti-strike laws the only ways to win free collective bargaining?

A: No. Ultimately, legislation will be the most effective way. But in the meantime, determined challenge of the injunctive power and anti-strike laws will cause boards of education to be more cautious in the use of these anti-union devices, and courts will be encouraged to seek better ways to use their power. For instance, in Michigan, most courts now require a school board to show that it has made an effort to bargain in good faith (enter court with clean hands) before an injunction will be issued.

Q: How about federal legislation?

A: It's a good trick if you can do it! There are many political and constitutional obstacles to overcome in order to secure such legislation. Education has been ruled a state function which can be regulated by federal law only when other rights are being denied by the state. CB for teachers may fall within this area, but at present it is a moot point at best. Most of our present problems center around unjust state laws and court actions. The political climate is more favorable to remedial action in some states than it is in others or in the Congress. Once we have been successful in some states, others will follow.

Q: What has been the experience in private industry? Weren't injunctions once used to defeat strikes in the private sector?

A: Yes. Such injunctions were outlawed, in the federal courts, by the Norris-LaGuardia Act, passed in 1932. Before that, however, many states had enacted anti-injunction statutes of their own, and this action was secured at a time when the labor movement was much less powerful than now. The state laws paved the way for a federal prohibition.

Q: What's wrong with the school board doing everything possible—including use of the injunction—to keep schools open? Isn't this a part of its function?

A: Use of the coercive power of the state disrupts normal collective bargaining. The "bargain" agreed upon makes clear the terms and conditions under which teachers will give their labor. If the courts, sheriff's deputies, jails, and heavy fines are thrown in on the employer's side, the "bargain" is apt to be unfair.

Q: Can teachers be fired for striking?

A: Yes. Firing for striking in private industry is prohibited as an unfair labor practice under most circumstances, but a striking teacher is technically guilty of "neglect of duty" and can be fired, despite tenure provisions. Thus, even if unfair injunctions were eliminated, teachers would still be at a disadvantage in bargaining compared with workers in the private sector. Of course, firing several hundred or several thousand teachers would be impractical as well as unjust, because it would be hard to replace so many skilled workers.

Q: Is there any substitute for the strike?

A: Ultimately, no. But there are steps which can be taken to reduce the likelihood of strikes and to minimize possible ill effects. Mediation during the final stages of bargaining helps avoid breakdowns and impasses over wording, for instance. Two-year contracts beginning with the first day of school in the fall reduce tension during the school year, although sometimes this arrangement is not practical due to peculiarities in budgeting schedules and other timetables beyond local control.

Q: How about arbitration?

A: Binding, impartial arbitration is essential as the last step in the grievance procedure in order to avoid work stoppages over interpretation of the contract. But submitting bargaining items to arbitration destroys collective bargaining. No one will negotiate if he knows that, in the end, an arbitrator will decide the issue. Both sides will want to go to the arbitrator with their optimum positions. Incidentally, this is really an academic question because very few school boards will accept arbitration on salaries, fringe benefits, and other budget items. Witness the Rhode Island experience where boards of education very often refuse to accept the terms of an arbitrator's award.

Q: Does the AFT favor no-strike clauses in its contracts?

A: Most AFT locals willingly include no-strike clauses in their contracts—provided the contract also provides for binding arbitration in the grievance procedure.

Q: What would prevent teachers from abusing their power if they gain legal approval for striking?

A: The same restraints operate on teachers as apply to other groups of workers. Teachers risk loss of pay and fringe benefits and possible disciplinary action when they strike, just like other workers. Furthermore, teachers know that after a strike they will still have to bring their students through to academic success, and the longer the strike, the harder this will be. Hence, most teachers are eager to avoid long work stoppages for professional reasons.

Q: Isn't a strike in public employment different from one in the private sector because of the lack of the profit motive and inability to pass the costs of the settlement on to the consumer?

A: This is only a superficial difference. The same "consumer money" must be used for the purchase of public labor, such as school teaching, as for private labor, such as auto manufacturing or the labor which makes TV sets. The question is how much of the total supply of money will be used for public projects, and how much will be used for other things; how much will be used to buy consumer items such as cars and TV sets and how much will be used for taxes (see writings of John Kenneth Galbraith).

Q: Should teachers wait until the law is changed so that teacher strikes are legally permissible before engaging in work stoppages?

A: No. If there is no agreement covering salaries, fringe benefits, working conditions, and other matters, teachers should not work. It will be difficult to induce legislators to vote for changes in present laws and rulings, because the "public" as employer has a selfish interest in the status quo. Teachers cannot wait for politicians to muster up the courage to vote for what is right. If a strike is necessary, and all other methods to resolve the impasse have failed, teachers should have the courage of their convictions and they should push ahead.

Q: How do other countries treat teacher strikes?

A: Almost all democratic countries permit teacher strikes. The communist countries do not permit such freedom, of course. In Canada, federal employees may strike after exhausting preventive procedures. In Alberta, compulsory arbitration was tried for a few years, but by agreement of both sides this system was abandoned in favor of the strike as the final means of settling disputes.

Q: You talk about "forced labor" as a result of injunctions. Isn't this exaggeration?

A: No. Because of various seniority arrangements, such as step advancement on salary schedules, retirement credit, and tenure rights, teachers are trapped in their jobs. It is very difficult for them to move to another system. Hence, when they are prevented from exercising free collective bargaining, they are being forced to work under conditions not satisfactory to them.

Q: When teachers strike, they are not really "quitting." Why don't they resign if they don't like their jobs?

A: Mass resignations have been declared illegal, too! Any concerted action to withhold their services can be enjoined just like an out-and-out strike.

The basic contents of this teaching unit—including most of the overview and the suggestions for Lessons 1, 2, and 3—were written at the AFT's request by Will Scoggins, a noted labor historian who teaches at El Camino College in California. Mr. Scoggins received his B.A. degree from Baylor University in 1949 and his M.S. degree from the University of Wisconsin in 1951. In 1960, he attended the University of Oslo while on a Fulbright teaching grant in Norway. He has taught history and government in several high schools and colleges since 1951. In 1964 and 1965, he served on the staff of the Center for Labor Research and Education of the Institute of Industrial Relations at the University of California, Los Angeles, and spent several months inquiring into the instruction that high schools in Los Angeles County give students who will soon enter the world of work as someone's employee. Out of that study came his book "Labor in Learning," published by the University of California in 1966.

The teaching unit was critically reviewed by John A. Sessions of the AFL-CIO education department, and by several former classroom teachers now on the staff of the American Federation of Teachers national office in Washington, D.C. A number of staff members contributed supplementary information to the unit.

Organizing teachers in the South

From just a trickle of activity in the early 1960s, the AFT's new organizing drive among Southern teachers is picking up power. There are now 25 active locals in Louisiana, Alabama, Georgia, Florida, Tennessee, and Kentucky filling the vacuum left by weak, ineffective, often racially segregated education associations.

Four years ago, James E. Swilley, then a 39-year-old history teacher in a Mobile, Ala., junior-high school, read in the newspaper that the Alabama state legislature had appropriated and sent to the Mobile school board enough money to raise each teacher's salary by $500.

The superintendent, Swilley learned, had no intention of paying the teachers the full amount. "All you're getting," he told an acquiescent education-association representative, "is a hundred dollars."

Swilley called the headquarters of the American Federation of Teachers, then in Chicago, and asked for help. Within hours, Howard Hursey, an AFT national representative, was on his way to Mobile.

"Howard and I and some other teachers created such a row," Swilley recalled recently, "that we got $475 of the $500 earmarked for teachers' raises, and membership in our new local started growing."

For that time and place in history, Swilley's story was unique.

Just a decade before, the national AFT had forced all of its white locals in the South to either integrate or turn in their charters. Local after local—usually pleading external pressure from their communities—declined to remove their racial restrictions, and the AFT gave up over 7,000 members in lily-white locals in Atlanta, Birmingham, Jacksonville, Chattanooga, New Orleans, and elsewhere, leaving only a handful of teacher unionists scattered below the Mason-Dixon Line. Three formerly all-black locals in New Orleans, Chattanooga, and Capitol County, Ga., stayed in the AFT and bravely tried to build integrated locals, but few white teachers would join. The sole exception occurred in Washington, D.C., where three AFT locals—black, white, and attendance officers—merged into one integrated local which later became bargaining agent for the city's teachers.

"All in all, it was a trying time," recalls Carl Megel, then AFT president and now its legislative director. "The membership loss cost us $50,000 a year in dues to the national and we had to lay off two fulltime organizers. But it was, for us, a matter of principle. As a national liberal organization, we could not tolerate segregation in any affiliate." The AFT's departure from the South left only the weak, administrator-dominated and racially segregated affiliates of the National Educational Association as the organizations for most teachers.

Thus, Swilley's phone call for assistance (which had been preceded by a short-lived attempt to organize an integrated local in Mobile) was a welcome signal to AFT headquarters that the climate for unionizing black and white teachers together in the South might be changing.

"We set up an integrated picket line," said Hursey, "probably the first in Mobile's history. The superintendent met with us and we got the $475 raise. We got the support of the Mobile labor movement, signed up large numbers of teachers, and kept growing."

MIX OF ISSUES

Swilley's and Hursey's reports generally reflect the mix of traditional bread-and-butter issues and social concerns that have set off the renaissance of teacher unionism in the South. The movement is the first to bring black and white teachers together into one organization, but it is not purely a civil-rights phenomenon. Neither is it all bread and butter. When 60 representatives of 18 locals from Alabama, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, and Tennessee gathered last month for a conference in Atlanta, the racial mix was about even, and the talk, centering equally on salaries and teacher rights, was just about the same as you might hear in the early stages of a union organizing drive anywhere. "For the South—with its tradition of antiunionism and racism—this conference is a major watershed," noted AFT President David Selden, who was present.

The Mobile experience was followed by a surge of union activity in two other Southern areas during the last half of the Sixties.

The old all-black New Orleans Local 527 had attracted some white members and, by 1968, was the largest of the four teacher organizations in the city, strong enough to lead two major strikes in demand of collective bargaining.

In Florida, when 12,000 teachers deserted the education association after its statewide strike failed in 1968, some began to set up local organizing committees of the AFT. Today there are 3,000 union teachers in 10 active Federation locals.

There are roughly 200,000 teachers in the six Southern states where AFT locals locals exist. While union membership is still only a small percentage of the total, new locals are rapidly being chartered and membership is steadily growing.

(Even in neighboring Texas—where union organizers once had to register with local authorities when they came to town—AFT has locals in Austin and at a private school in El Paso, both chartered last year.)

Representatives of the Southern locals who attended last month's conference in Atlanta gave National Representatives Hursey and David Mann, the two AFT organizers now assigned to the South, an enthusiastic account of current activities.

State by state, here's what they reported:

ALABAMA

There are active AFT affiliates in Mobile and Gadsden. In Birmingham, an AFT organizing committee was set up following a meeting of 375 teachers Sept. 16.

Although Alabama law technically prohibits collective bargaining by teachers with their school boards, both Mobile and Gadsden AFT leaders are making salary demands on their school boards, report Swilley and Mrs. India Temple, president of Local 1241 in Gadsden.

"But our major source of strength with teachers is our effective handling of grievances," Swilley reports. "The association still has lots of administrators and whenever a teacher has a grievance, it's easy for her principal to squelch it in the association." Teachers who are joining the union, he said, "find we give them some muscle. This," he said, "is especially true among some of the black teachers who have been working under autocratic principals who run their AFT activists from throughout the South listen to David Selden, national AFT president (seated, left) at a recent regional conference in Atlanta. The delegates to the conference represented 18 locals in five states. At left, standing, is George Brickhouse, AFT director of field services. schools like feudal lords and ladies." Swilley said the two major grievances now before the board involve violations of the union's faculty-desegregation policy adopted by the board. Desegregation was to have been accomplished in four steps: first, by using new hires; second, by voluntary transfer; third, by involuntary transfer of nontenured teachers; and fourth, by involuntary transfer of tenured teachers according to seniority. At least two black teachers were transferred outside of the policy, and the union is fighting their cases.

Meanwhile, in Birmingham, the AFT organizing committee has developed a 14-point program centering around salary increases, a weak tenure rule, and high class size.

"Last year, Birmingham's school board did not implement the salary increment due teachers," Hursey said, "and there is a great deal of resentment building up among teachers. One of the local's organizers is in his fourth year of teaching here and earns $5,200."

FLORIDA

"The wounds between teachers and the community caused by the association's statewide strike are starting to heal," reports Florida AFT Coordinator Ralph Lloyd, two years later.

Vincent Exley, new president of the Jacksonville local, illustrated the difference between union and association philosophy: "The old teacher organization," he said, "emanated intellectual snobbery and believed that teachers were different and didn't have to get involved in other people's problems.

"When the walkout came two years ago, we found we were isolated and politically sterile. No one did anything for us.

"My activity in the AFT these past months is the antithesis of this approach. I'm now living what I've been teaching about community involvement. We've been meeting with community people who've got problems—not the chamber of commerce types. We've joined the AFL-CIO central labor body and we've been helping them and they've been helping us. Together we defeated a proposed endorsement of one of the school board members who was rough on teachers during the walkout and is now running for the state legislature."

A Floridian from Ocala told the conference that his local was making community contacts by sending all union literature to key officials of parent and neighborhood groups. "We're showing them we're on their side."

AFT affiliates in Florida now have 3,000 members—up by a third from last year, Lloyd reports. By December, when there will be 19 functioning locals, AFT unions will be organized in counties with a total potential jurisdiction of over 50,000 of the state's 68,000 teachers.

In Dade and Jacksonville counties, local unions have won dues checkoff, and most locals have some kinds of recognized rights ranging from mailbox distribution to use of school buildings for meetings.

Lloyd says the major accomplishments of the state federation during the past year were winning a state supreme court case establishing equal rights for all teacher organizations; winning all union security demands made to the Dade County (Miami) board of education; succeeding in having the union's teacher-transfer policy for school desegregation adopted in Dade County; building a community alliance to develop a funded More Effective School in Tampa; lobbying activities by organizer Louise Alford which succeeded in removing regressive measures in the state teacher-retirement system; and winning several important teacher-rights cases.

GEORGIA

Two new locals—in Atlanta and Savannah—were chartered last spring to make a total of three AFT affiliates in Georgia. (The third is in Capitol County, a school district outside Atlanta.)

The Savannah and Atlanta locals, less than six months old, have signed up more than 500 members each. As in Mobile, the unions' effectiveness in grievance handling is their strongest organizing point.

"We have 19 grievances now before the school administration," Ryburn Stephens, president of the Atlanta local says. "We are winning most of them, and the local is building a reputation as an activist organization, while the two NEA affiliates are still quibbling over how they're going to merge the separate black and white associations. Our local is well integrated and gaining members steadily."

That the success of the Atlanta local is worrying the city's establishment was shown when the city council rescinded dues-checkoff rights for all city employee groups rather than give them to the AFT. The union is seeking to have dues-deduction restored for all.

The best-publicized grievance is the union's campaign to win maternity-leave rights for a nontenured teacher. The board forced the teacher to resign rather than give her a leave of absence. The union has won the first skirmish in court with the rejection of a school-board motion to dismiss the case.

KENTUCKY

Technically a border state, Kentucky was not represented at the Southern conference, but two AFT locals are active—Louisville and Jefferson County, Local 672; and Carter County, Local 995.

Richard Miller, president of the Kentucky Federation of Teachers, reports that many teachers are switching over from the education association as a result of the association's "misleadership" during a statewide work stoppage last spring. "While the union maintained a militant stance and urged the association leadership to hold out for its demands, the association leadership capitulated and ended the strike with nothing won," he said. "Association membership is down, and ours is increasing."

LOUISIANA

Teamwork between the Louisiana Federation of Teachers and the state AFL-CIO won a $1,200 raise for all teachers last spring in the state legislature, Pete Saunders, president of the state federation, reports, and that fact is being used to demonstrate why Louisiana teachers should join the union.

A fall-semester membership drive is taking place in New Orleans, the state's largest local. "We've had a lot of apathy in the past," Local 527 President Gene Didier said, "and 2,000 teachers haven't belonged to anything. But our organizing drive picked up 95 new members in the first week of school alone this semester, and we're by far the largest teacher organization in the city."

There are four other AFT locals in the state—one representing public-school secretaries in New Orleans, another at Delgado College, a third in Jefferson Parish, and the fourth in Vermillion Parish.

"Teachers will be working on the board of education election campaign this fall," Didier said. "If we can succeed in electing a labor-endorsed candidate for the board, we'll have at least three votes for collective bargaining, the issue over which we struck two years ago."

Didier said the union was encouraging the formation of a citizens' advisory committee to Local 527 in anticipation of collective bargaining. "We want the community to be in on formulating our bargaining demands. If we have to strike, we want the people on our side."

TENNESSEE

Two new locals were chartered in Tennessee last spring, bringing the total in the state to five. The newest affiliates are in Memphis and Fayette County; the others are in Nashville, Carter County, and Chattanooga.

The Memphis local has run up against a massive union-busting campaign, reported George Dowdy, one of its representatives at the Atlanta conference, but local members are taking it in stride.

Organized in the wake of the sanitation workers' victory in Memphis, the local has thrown the school board into a state of alarm, Dowdy said; when news of the new local leaked out, the board met hastily to increase the membership needed to win official recognition, from 51 percent to 66 percent.

"We didn't get mailbox privileges or any other rights," he said. "The only way we have to communicate is through the press and through mailings, and with the help of those brave enough to stuff teachers' mailboxes with union literature."

The local successfully fought the dismissal of one of its founders. After picketing of the board of education, in which community residents from the neighborhood surrounding her school participated with teachers, the board changed its mind and rehired her.

"Memphis is a hard city," Hursey concurred. "During our picketline, someone tried to ram through with a car, nearly injuring a number of teachers. It's going to take a tough organizing drive to crack it."

OTHER STATES

Texas has two AFT locals; one, in Austin, represents public-school teachers; the other, in El Paso, has a union-shop contract with the management of a privately operated foreign-language-instruction school which teaches oriental languages to U.S. government personnel.

George Brickhouse, AFT director of field services, reports having received inquiries this fall from teachers in Virginia, the two Carolinas, Arkansas, and Mississippi. Of these inquiries, he anticipates that one will result in a new local this fall, in Richmond, Va.

RACIAL BALANCE

Militancy and teacher-domination is one unique feature that distinguishes the AFT locals from the local education associations. The other is racial integration. Most local affiliates of the NEA are still strictly segregated, despite the well-publicized "mergers" of their parent state groups. ("While merger has been accomplished at the state level, many locals remain to be merged," writes North Carolina Association of Educators Executive Secretary A. C. Dawson in the September issue of North Carolina Education.)

"About 25 percent of our new membership this fall is white," says Gene Didier, the president of the New Orleans local, which has been a predominantly black affiliate. "The whites who are joining are young, idealistic, just out of college, and generally prounion. They have no hangups about segregation."

In the other Southern locals, the same kinds of reports are heard and, as nearly as can be determined, black and white membership is about equal throughout the South.

This development, if it holds, may prove that the AFT's approach to the problem of segregation in the 1950s was the right one. While NEA still struggles toward merger, the Seventies are seeing the building of a militant, desegregated movement of unionized teachers throughout the South.

Charter 2nd hospital local in S. Carolina

COLUMBIA, S.C.—With over 1,000 signed authorization cards from workers at two major hospitals here, a second hospital local has been chartered in this state, thus reinforcing last year's historic victory in Charleston.

With the impetus of Charleston behind them, the organization campaigns at the two institutions—Crafts-Farrow and South Carolina State Mental Hospital—were rapid and effective.

Union officials realize, however, that their organizing efforts will be meaningless, as far as gains for the workers are concerned, unless enough pressure can be exerted to bring about passage of state legislation insuring full collective bargaining rights for hospital workers.

The seriousness of this legal obstacle was illustrated last year when the Charleston workers struck for 100 days, drawing considerable national attention and sympathy, in the face of claims by state officials that state law prevented union recognition.

In their efforts to achieve more permanent success and less uncertainty for future campaigns, union officials testified at a state legislative hearing on Oct. 20, while several hundred workers held a lively rally outside.

Org. Horace Small headed up the organization campaign. In the closing stages, Exec. Vice-Pres. Elliott Godoff of the RWDSU National Hospital Division spoke at a rally attended by 500 workers in Columbia, and pledged the full support of the national union in bringing them union conditions enjoyed by their fellow workers in other states.

'315' members make gains in two pacts

ATLANTA, Ga.—Local 315 has negotiated a two-year renewal for 40 employees of the Bumper Service Co. here, and has ratified a first agreement for the workers of the North Georgia Dairies of Dalton, about 50 miles from Atlanta. The union won an election at the dairy plant Aug. 26.

The agreement at Bumper Service provides for across-the-board wage hikes of 25 cents an hour each year, an increase in health and welfare benefits, and for the first time, three days bereavement leave and three weeks vacation after five years. The maximum vacation previously, regardless of length of service, was two weeks.

The negotiating committee consisted of Hugh Smalley, Sam Hughley and Georgia Council Rep. Herschel Holmes.

The two-year pact at North Georgia Dairies calls for a wage increase for the relief driver of $7.50 a week the first year, and ten cents an hour for the loader. All wage hikes are for the first year, as the contract provides for a wage reopener prior to the second year.

There was an important change in calculating commissions for whole milk and ice cream routemen. Under the new procedure, these employees will gain about $100 a month.

Other contract provisions include grievance procedure, dues checkoff, three days funeral leave, an increase to five holidays instead of the former two, and coverage under the Int'l Health and Welfare Plan. The vacation clause calls for one week after one year, two after five and three weeks after 12 years of service.

Rep. Herschel Holmes, who led the organizing drive at the dairy plant, headed the negotiations with assistance from J. C. Barrett.

WINSTON-SALEM, N.C. (PAI) —A study conducted by the North Carolina League of Municipalities found that some union or other local employee organization exists in 25 percent of North Carolina's cities with populations of 5,000 or more.

The International Association of Fire Fighters was the most prevalent national union. Next came the Fraternal Order of Police and then the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees.

I urge the Congress to provide funds to medical schools, nursing schools, environmental engineering schools, social work schools, allied health professional schools and neighborhood health centers specifically to provide for the training of all the varieties of health professionals--as students--in such integrated health centers, as well as to give the health centers themselves increased capacity for the training of local residents in technical skills for the emerging new health careers that can be opened. This nation has the capacity to train and employ thousands of currently impoverished citizens as environmental technicians and in similar health roles to do the job of improving their own community environments.

Current graduates of the various professional schools are ill equipped to function effectively in a comprehensive program. For example, where does a medical student now learn what a sanitarian does or how to relate to him? Where does a nursing student learn how to work closely with a community organizeer? We feel that community health centers can provide this kind of experience and better equip the professional to deal with these issues. We have attempted to do this at Tufts-Delta Health Center and have had over 60 students with us from across the nation. This, however, requires funds and I urge Congress to make them available.

THE CAREER OF THE PUBLIC SCHOOL ADULT ADMINISTRATOR

By Jack London
Associate Professor, School of Education, University of California, Berkeley

Introduction

THE prevalence of the concept of education being for the young, and the organization of educational institutions to serve this age grouping, has resulted in adult education assuming a marginal role within formal educational institutions.* Other indices of marginality of adult education have been discussed by Clark in his study of the Los Angeles adult education program.[1]

While it is posited that adult education has a marginal status within education,[2] it is being assumed that adult education will become less marginal as it becomes better organized; improves the quality of its performance; attracts highly competent personnel to its professional staff; and secures greater recognition of the important role of adult education in a mass industrial society seeking to maintain and extend its democratic character.[3]

A casual survey of the field of adult education reveals varying degrees of legitimacy for its activities which supports the assumption underlying this study. The purpose of this paper is to examine the career pattern of the public school adult administrator in California as a basis for making recommendations for the improvement of the quality and scope of adult education in order to reduce the marginality of the field, and toward the objective of making adult education a central concern of all formal and informal educational programs in our society.

This analysis of the career of the adult school administrator will attempt to outline his relationship to movement through the public school occupational system. It will describe the origin of the position as a separate occupation, its legal basis, the prevailing practice of appointment, the adult administrator's present standing within the system of public education, and the various stages of his career mobility. The primary methods of data collection were interviewing and participant observation over a three-year period. A more detailed discussion of methodology will be presented in the writer's forthcoming monograph on public school adult education in California.

In the beginning, the administration of adult education in the public schools of California was assigned to regular day school administrative personnel. This earlier view of adult education was defined in a 1916 study of the San Francisco Schools:

> The salary schedule for the school system should be revised to provide for the employment of teachers, principals, and directors under the following plans of service: (1) morning and afternoon, (2) morning and evening, (3) afternoon and evening.[3-a]

In 1931, the State Department of Education recognized the need to con-

Discipline & Discharge in the United States Postal Service: Adverse Action and Appeal

by
Harry R. Blaine, Eugene C. Hagburg,
Frederick A. Zeller

Introduction

Collective bargaining in the Federal Service became a reality when, on January 17, 1962, President John F. Kennedy signed Executive Order 10988 into law. This document standardized employee-management relations in the Federal Service and explicitly recognized the right of federal employees to organize and bargain collectively.[1] Among other rights guaranteed qualifying organizations, the Order recognized the right of such organizations to bargain for a grievance procedure.[2] Since, traditionally, government service has distinguished between "grievance" and "appeal", this distinction was written into the Executive Order, thus necessitating separate analysis of each procedure.[3]

The President's Task Force on Employee-Management Relations in the Federal Service found, upon a review of appeal procedures available to federal employees, that while veterans could appeal cases of discipline or discharge to the Civil Service Commission on either the merits of the action or on alleged violations of procedure, non-veterans could appeal only on matters of procedure.[4] The Task Force proposed that this disparity be corrected by extending rights to all civil service employees in adverse action appeals identical to those offered veterans under the Veterans Preference Act of 1944.[5] In addition, the Task Force discovered that not all agencies provided for internal review of actions adverse to an employee, thus creating further imbalance. To correct this, they recommended that all agencies make provision for internal review and settlement of adverse action appeals.[6]

SUBCHAPTER IV.

RIGHT OF PUBLIC EMPLOYES TO ORGANIZE OR JOIN LABOR ORGANIZATIONS AND RELATING TO BARGAINING IN MUNICIPAL EMPLOYMENT.

111.70 Municipal employment.

(1) DEFINITIONS. When used in this section:

(a) "Municipal employer" means any city, county, village, town metropolitan sewerage district, school district or any other political subdivision of the state.

(b) "Municipal employe" means any employe of a municipal employer except city and village policemen, sheriff's deputies, and county traffic officers.

(c) "Board" means the Wisconsin employment relations board.

(2) RIGHTS OF MUNICIPAL EMPLOYES. Municipal employes shall have the right of self-organization, to affiliate with labor organizations of their own choosing and the right to be represented by labor organizations of their own choice in conferences and negotiations with their municipal employers or their representatives on questions of wages, hours and conditions of employment, and such employes shall have the right to refrain from any and all such activities.

(3) PROHIBITED PRACTICES. (a) Municipal employers, their officers and agents are prohibited from:

1. Interfering with, restraining or coercing any municipal employe in the exercise of the rights provided in sub. (2).

2. Encouraging or discouraging membership in any labor organization, employe agency, committee, association or representation plan by discrimination in regard to hiring, tenure or other terms or conditions of employment.

(b) Municipal employes individually or in concert with others are prohibited from:

1. Coercing, intimidating or interfering with municipal employes in the enjoyment of their legal rights including those set forth in sub. (2).

2. Attempting to induce a municipal employer to coerce, intimidate or interfere with a municipal employe in the enjoyment of his legal rights including those set forth in sub. (2).

CHAPTER 62

CITIES, GENERAL CHARTER LAW.

62.13 Police and fire departments

(1) COMMISSIONERS. Each city shall have a board of police and fire commissioners consisting of 5 citizens, 3 of whom shall constitute a quorum. The mayor shall annually, between the last Monday of April and the first Monday of May, appoint in writing to be filed with the secretary of the board, one member for a term of 5 years. No appointment shall be made which will result in more than 3 members of the board belonging to the same political party. The board shall keep a record of its proceedings.

(2) EXCEPTION. Subsections (1) to (6) shall not apply to cities of less than 4,000 population except by ordinance adopted by a majority of all the members of the council. A repealing ordinance may be adopted by a like vote.

(3) CHIEFS. The board shall appoint the chief of police and the chief of the fire department, who shall hold their offices during good behavior, subject to suspension or removal by the board for cause.

(4) SUBORDINATES; REEMPLOYMENT. (a) The chiefs shall appoint subordinates subject to approval by the board. Such appointments shall be made by promotion when this can be done with advantage, otherwise from an eligible list provided by examination and approval by the board and kept on file with the clerk.

(b) Any person who, on June 23, 1943 shall have served and acted as a full-time city police patrolman or police officer performing the services by virtue of regular assignment therefor under the orders and supervision of the chief of police of said city, and receiving his salary on the regular official pay roll of said police department for a continuous period of more than 10 years, although not regularly appointed from an eligible list, shall be deemed to have been regularly appointed, as of the time of the commencement of his service, and upon payment into the police pension fund of the amounts required by law since said time, shall be entitled to the same pension rights under this section as if employed for such period as a regular appointee.

(c) For the choosing of such list the board shall adopt, and may repeal or modify, rules calculated to secure the best service in the departments. These rules shall provide for examination of physical and educational qualifications, habits, reputation, and experience, and may provide such competitive examinations as the board shall determine, and for the classification of positions with special examination for each class. The board shall print and distribute the rules and all changes in them, at city expense.

WHY A WRITTEN AGREEMENT?

From the statement of Professor Nathan P. Feinsinger as Chairman of the "Milwaukee Fact Finding Panel".

Written Contract - Except for those matters which are required by law to be dealt with by Ordinance or Resolution*, the Panel recommends that all terms or conditions of employment finally agreed upon by the parties be incorporated into a written signed contract.

On the question of a written contract, it has recently been stated:

> "The applicable state statute provides that if a settlement is reached, on the completion of collective bargaining negotiations, 'The employer shall reduce the same to writing either in the form of an ordinance, resolution or agreement. Such agreement may include a term for which it shall remain in effect not to exceed one year. Such agreements shall be binding on the parties only if express language to that effect is contained therein'.
> Sec. 111.70 (4) (i), stats. (emphasis added by Panel)
> "Incorporation of the terms agreed upon between employer and union in a written and signed contract is practically universal, and is required by law when demanded, in unionized private employment.
> "Embodiment of the agreed terms with respect to wages, hours, fringe benefits and other conditions of employment in a single written and signed contract, copies of which may readily be printed and distributed to all concerned, is businesslike and has advantages in the way of convenience of reference, and it tends to give to the employees a feeling of assurance that they are recognized as equal parties to the bargain and can rely on wholehearted adherence to its terms."

The above language is quoted from the Report of E. L. Wingert, Fact Finder, In the Matter of the Petition of Shawano County Highway Employees Union, Local 1520, AFSCME, AFL-CIO, Case II, No. 9061, FF-12, dated October 1, 1963, at pages 15-16. See also H. J. Heinz Co. v. National Labor Relations Board, 311 U.S. 514, 61 Sup. Ct. 320, 85 L. Ed. 303 (1941) stating:

* Those matters required by law to be dealt with by Ordinance or Resolution may be incorporated into the contract by reference or summary and reference.

"in support of this contention (of the Board, that a refusal to sign a contract embodying the terms agreed upon is a refusal to bargain) it (the Board) points to the history of the collective bargaining process showing that its object has long been an agreement between employer and employee as to wages, hours and working conditions evidence by a signed contract or statement in writing, which serves both as recognition of the union with which the agreement is reached and as a permanent memorial of its terms. This experience has shown that refusal to sign a written contract has been a not infrequent means of frustrating the bargaining process through the refusal to recognize the labor organization as a party to it and the refusal to provide an authentic record of its terms which could be exhibited to employees, as evidence of the good faith of the employer. Such refusals have proved fruitful sources of dissatisfaction and disagreement. Contrasted with the unilateral statement by the employer of his labor policy, the signed agreement has been regarded as the effective instrument of stabilizing labor relations and preventing, through collective bargaining, strikes and industrial strife."

See also Section 8 (d) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended in 1947 by the Taft-Hartley Act, defining collective bargaining as including "the execution of a written contract incorporating any agreement reached if requested by either party."

This agreement entered into this _____ day of _____ _____, 1963, by and between the City of Beloit, through its City Manager, R. H. Calland, and resolution of the City Council of the City of Beloit, dated the _____ day of _____, 1963, the Police and Fire Commission of the City of Beloit, by its President Philip Kinzer, by resolution of the Police and Fire Commission dated the _____ day of _____, 1963, hereinafter collectively referred to as the City, and the International Association of Fire Fighters, Local Union 583, AFL-CIO, hereinafter referred to as the Union.

It is expressly understood between the parties to this agreement that the provisions herein shall in no way modify or change the provisions of Section 62.13 of the Wisconsin Statutes, 1961, as provides for the establishment and powers of a police and fire commission for cities, and the rights of firemen employed by the City of Beloit.

It is further understood by the parties that Section 62.13 of the Wisconsin Statutes is an enactment of statewide concern for the purpose of providing a uniform system of regulation of fire departments within the State of Wisconsin, in case of any conflict with the provisions of this agreement and the statutory provisions of the Wisconsin Statutes the said statutory provisions shall govern notwithstanding any provision of this agreement to the contrary.

WHEREAS, the mutual interests of the parties hereto are recognized by this agreement for the operation of the Fire Department of the City of Beloit, under methods that will promote efficiency, safety, cleanliness, proper care of equipment, property and the facilities of fair and peaceful adjustment of differences that might arise from time to time, and promulgating of rules and regulations and ethical conduct of business relations between the employer and employee, and to provide the best possible fire protection for life and property to all of the citizens of the City of Beloit.

NOW, THEREFORE, the parties have reached this agreement.

GRIEVANCE HANDLING QUESTIONNAIRE FOR PUBLIC EMPLOYEES

Listed below are a number of problems in handling grievances that may exist where you work or they may not. Put a check in the column that most accurately expresses the way you size up the particular problem. If the problem comes up often or frequently put a check in the column headed "frequent". If it comes up rarely check the column headed "sometimes". If it hasn't come up, check the "never" column. If you're uncertain, or you don't know, check the "no opinion" column.

PROBLEM	Frequent	Sometimes	Never	No Opinion
1. Grievances from characters, wise guys and troublemakers.
2. Members bypass the steward and go directly to a supervisor.
3. Grievances arising out of personal problems of workers in the department.
4. Employee expects too much from the steward.
5. It's difficult getting workers to file a grievance.
6. It's difficult getting the real facts about a complaint.
7. Employee is afraid to file a grievance.
8. It's difficult getting the grievance in writing.

PROCEDURE FOR HANDLING EMPLOYEE PROBLEMS

Any employee in the classified service of the University who feels aggrieved or has a personnel problem, may present his problem to university authorities through the established grievance procedure and shall not be discriminated against on that account. The same procedure shall be followed by a group of employees presenting a joint grievance. Any employee, or group of employees, who are members of a union, may, if they desire, be represented by representatives of their union or representatives of any affiliated body. They may enter into the Proceedings under Step I, 1 and 2; Step II, 1, 2 and 3.

Step I

A. A personnel problem, or a charge of unfair treatment by an employee, shall not be considered a grievance until:

1. First, the matter complained of shall have been discussed by the employee with his supervisor. If they have been unable to reach a mutually satisfactory settlement within one working day after such discussion, and

2. Second, the matter complained of shall have been reviewed jointly by the employee concerned, the supervisor and the department head, and they have been unable to reach a mutually satisfactory settlement of the complaint within two working days after such discussion.

Step II

A. A personnel problem or a charge of unfair treatment which has not been settled under the procedure outlined in Step I, shall be submitted to the university authorities in writing as a grievance in the following manner:

1. First, a copy of the grievance, on forms prepared for such prupose by the university, and signed by the aggrieved employee, shall be sent to each of the following:

   The employee's supervisor
   The employee's department head
   The University Personnel Office

2. The aggrieved employee shall discuss the written grievance jointly with the employee's supervisor, department head, and the University Personnel Office.

3. Third, in the event a mutually satisfactory settlement cannot be reached within five days after such discussion, the grievance shall be promptly referred by the University Personnel Office to the University Vice President of Business and Finance, together with all papers, documents, and other information relating thereto, for settlement.

Step III

A. In the event a mutually satisfactory settlement cannot be reached within five working days after the discussion provided for in the third part of Step II, the aggrieved employee may file an appeal to the state bureau of personnel, or the personnel board, in accordance with the statutes relating to employees in the classified service and the civil service rules made pursuant thereto.

B. In order to protect the statutory appeal rights of the aggrieved employee, any employee grievance arising out of circumstances covered by section 16.24 of the statutes relating to removals, suspensions, discharges, reductions, dismissals and layoffs, which has been submitted to the university under this grievance procedure may be appealed to the personnel board by the aggrieved employee, at any time within 10 days following the effective date of the action of the employing officer.

C. In order to protect the appeal rights of an aggrieved employee, any employee grievance arising out of the reallocation of a position under Rule V, (2), Civil Service Law and Rules, Bureau of Personnel, which has been submitted to the university under this grievance Procedure, may be appealed to the personnel board at any time within 15 days from the date of notification of such reallocation.

THE INFORMATION WHICH SHOULD GO INTO A GRIEVANCE OR COMPLAINT

Public Employee Unions

The Circumstances - the Facts

Who is involved: the employee(s), the steward, the supervisor

What happened to the employee - or, what failed to happen?

Where did the occurrence take place - shop, department, section, etc.?

When did it occur - date, shift, time of day?

The Union's Contention

What does the Union believe should have been done, or should not have been done under the circumstances, and in accordance with what rules, ordinances, or policies?

Note: You may not always want to cite the exact section of an ordinance or rule; when you specify, you may limit the area for argument; sometimes it is helpful to be in a position to argue the whole problem.

The Request for Settlement

What action the Union wants management to take: always remember the importance of being specific in your request for settlement, starting with what you consider to be a proper and just settlement -- and don't forget the matter of retroactivity in cases involving pay.

How much to write: a well written grievance need not be long or complicated. Simply state the situation and what you think should be done. Support for your contention can come when you discuss the case with supervision. Any effort to write a complete description may still result in something being left out, and may provide supervision with ideas it may not otherwise think of.

WHERE TO GET THE FACTS

1. From the worker or workers involved - check their facts, however.
2. From employees in the same department on same or different shifts.
3. From workers in other departments related to operation involved in complaint.
4. From agreements, rules and ordinances.
5. From past practices, settled grievances and civil service hearings.
6. From management - how accurate their information is depends upon experience and the facts of the case - check their facts too!

DUTIES OF THE STEWARD

Public Employee Unions

1. KNOW THE GRIEVANCE PROCEDURE AND CIVIL SERVICE RULES

- What they say, what they mean, and how they work.
- Examine them in the light of his experience with them and be ready to recommend changes, with the reasons (documented, if possible) for the proposed changes.

2. KNOW THE DEPARTMENT

- The various operations and how they relate to department's work.
- Seniority standings and other details pertaining to the area of the steward's jurisdiction.

3. KNOW THE WORKERS

- Relative seniority standings, wage rates, individual problems, individual abilities, family background and interests.
- Recognize the differences between workers as human beings and be prepared to deal with each worker in the way which will bring the best results.

4. KNOW THE MOST EFFECTIVE WAYS OF REPRESENTING MEMBERS BEFORE SUPERVISION.

- Remember that the steward is the representative of the workers and is not an impartial umpire, or a straw-boss on behalf of supervision.
- Be able to interview aggrieved workers, prepare notes on the case, write grievances, present the case, follow up on the results.

5. BE A UNION MEMBER IN THE FULLEST SENSE OF THE WORD

- Remember that the steward is often THE UNION to workers in the department.
- Learn about the history and methods and goals of his union and the labor movement and keep up-to-date on local and national developments.
- Introduce new members to the history, business and operation of the union.
- Sign up new workers and explain the union to them.
- Keep members informed of what is going on.
- Urge attendance at meetings and do everything possible to get the members to turn out.
- Develop full participation in the union's program among the workers under his jurisdiction.
- Help develop thought and discussion at union meetings.
- Assist in carrying out the majority decisions of the membership.
- Help to interpret the union's program to the community.

COUNCIL
AND MUNICIPAL EMPLOYEES
AFL-CIO

1960

School board president calls NEA "greatest single fraud:" Walter Davis, president of the Cleveland board of education, right, who addressed Union Teacher Press Association luncheon in Detroit, pinning the label on the National Education Association and, left, Mrs. Marie L. Caylor, American Teachers editor and UTPA founder. Mrs. Caylor and Davis, also a labor editor, are International Labor Press Association vice-presidents.

UTPA Luncheon Speaker Calls NEA Greatest Single Fraud

DETROIT, Mich.—The president of the Cleveland board of education told American Federation of Teachers editors and members at the 8th annual Union Teacher Press Association luncheon that the "NEA, it seems to me, is the greatest single fraud ever perpetrated on the American people."

Walter Davis of Cleveland, O., also a labor editor and vice-president of the International Labor Press Association, spoke at the luncheon, adding "the NEA is a fallacy, promising deliverance but delivers bondage to an employer-oriented philosophy."

He said the NEA is not totally a useless organization since it has performed services in perhaps raising professional standards, and added, "on the basis of what I have seen, there is no better statistical organization in the field of education."

Don't Pay Rent

He continued: "Statistics don't pay the rent either. I know this is old hat to you, but I am saying it now, not you. The hard fact is that the NEA is the best example of the most vicious kind of company union. How can you make out when the boss is chairman of the (employee's) negotiating committee?

"This is bad business for both sides because it only leads to a malignant case of frustration and discontent. What really annoys me is that the NEA has the gall to moan about the serious problems confronted by the American teacher.

"This is like Tommy Manville complaining about the divorce rate. If it is necessary for me to clarify this analogy, then let me point out that it is the NEA which has been primarily responsible for causing the crisis we face in education, and it is the NEA which is having little or no impact on the crisis."

Teachers the Key

Davis said the key to the crisis in education is obtaining and keeping enough qualified teachers and that this can be done, "only through a union which is really a union." He declared bargaining inevitable, and quoted the six principles for bargaining stated by Jack Barbash in the December, 1957, issue of the American Teacher magazine.

Turning to the quality of state and local AFT publications, Davis told his listeners "you have many superior publications," but added that as far as appearance is concerned "you ought to be ashamed of yourselves."

"You wallow in talented manpower," he chided, "yet you turn out horribly unattractive publications in many cases. The wonderful exceptions you produce prove that you are truly capable . . . I think it is fair to say that many of your papers could be improved without spending a single solitary cent.

"I am an old labor press guy. I have long had the dream of a doctor employed by the AFL-CIO—a doctor of sick papers... It seems to me you ought to spend some precious dollars in fixing up the business of communications. It is essential."

Davis urged that school boards be improved by the election of more labor members and by teachers playing a more militant public role generally. Davis is editor of the Cleveland Retail Clerks Local 880 News and Views.

Fourteen Publications Win 22 American Teacher Awards

DETROIT, Mich. — Fourteen publications of state and local affiliates of the American Federation of Teachers carried off the 22 annual American Teacher's citation awards at the Union Teacher Press Association Luncheon at the AFT convention here.

The luncheon was chaired by James L. Fitzpatrick of Milwaukee, UTPA president, and the awards by disinterested judges were presented by American Teachers Editor Marie L. Caylor following an address by Walter Davis, labor-member president of the Cleveland board of education.

Firsts in editorial excellence were taken by the United Teacher of New York City in the newspaper category; the New Jersey Teacher among printed bulletins, and the Milwaukee Newsletter for mimeographed bulletins.

Thirty-six Entries

The competition was the eighth annual at American Federation of Teachers conventions. Thirty-six publications were entered this year.

Judges in the contest were: Harold A. DeLong, editor of the Detroit Labor News, chairman; Dr. Wes Maurer, chairman of the department of journalism, University of Michigan, and Henry Santiestevan, managing editor of UAW Solidarity, Detroit.

Award winners in the newspaper, printed or offset bulletins and mimeographed bulletins were:

experience with the liability plan.

Twice As Many Covered

Megel added that almost twice as many teachers are presently covered as at the time of the plan's inauguration and that the increased coverage is another example of the benefits of growth.

Wohlers said that while new certificates will not be issued to each member because of the extensive cost of doing so, nevertheless each claim presented after Oct. 1 will carry the $35,000 protection.

The insurance advisor reiterated the urgency that members report claims against them promptly to their Local president, and to the AFT and Wohlers' office, 111 West Jackson, Chicago.

Protects Against Suits

The liability insurance protects teachers against damages up to the amount of the insurance, in cases following accidental injury or death of a student while in their charge.

The protection applies to civil suits, and the plan covers American Federation of Teachers members only.

Teacher Defended by Lloyds Absolved in Damage Suit

ST. PAUL, Minn.—A Dakota County jury absolved a former West St. Paul high school teacher and American Federation of Teachers member of unreasonable punishment of a student three years ago.

After slightly more than two hours' deliberation, the jury ruled that the teacher, Wilton Gervais, now a Twin Cities attorney, did not exceed the state law's interpretation of reasonable punishment when he slapped Mike Stratton, a sophomore at West St. Paul high school, on Sept. 24, 1959.

The suit, brought by Mike's father, Glenn Stratton, alleged injuries and asked for $3,500 in general damages, $5,000 in punitive damages, and $250 out-of-pocket expenses for treating the claimed injuries.

Gervais was represented by Arthur Nelson, a Minneapolis attorney, who was employed by Lloyds of London, the liability insurance company for the American Federation of Teachers. Nelson presented three students and several teachers in behalf of Gervais who testified that young Stratton was slapped and did not have the lip cut the suit claimed.

Humanities Professor Sounds Call to Arms

Herrmann Warns Convention Shun Fake Professionalism

*By Henry Herrmann, Ph.D.

My talk rests on the proposition that only teachers who are themselves free, are fit to teach freedom to the young. A teacher who works in an atmosphere of coercion and oppression, and accepts it, is therefore unfit to transmit the "blessings of liberty" to the new generation of Americans.

A teacher who is enslaved by reason of being a member of an administrator-dominated union must first break the bonds of his own enslavement if he is to teach the young what it means to be free.

We all look to the rapid improvement of our public schools. The success of the American experiment rests on the maximum efficiency of our system of public education. In the feverish attempt to improve matters, all kinds of intemperate critics of our public schools have broken into print.

In educational matters, nearly everybody is a self-appointed expert, and, everything considered, this is not a bad thing. But the idea that teachers can improve matters by building a "profession" in imitation of other professions, has resulted in a much greater hindrance than a help.

A fake professionalism can be a very retarding influence and usually is. I should like to maintain that teaching is not a profession. Teachers are workers. When members of the medical profession want something badly enough, as they did in Canada recently, they go on strike in the same way that mine workers or factory workers or teachers do.

Puts Teachers First

Let us get rid of the pseudo-professionalism in our thinking. I would rather that the "prestige" professions emulate the teachers than have the teachers imitate the professions. Teachers have a more genuine sense of public service, are more responsive to the needs of people, have a far greater social sensitivity than any other group of the so-called "professions."

This more liberal spirit of teachers has come about through the influence of the American Federation of Teachers and its affiliation with organized labor. I am speaking of not just the good, dues-paying members of the Federation. Teachers who are not members, besides benefiting by the wage increases that the Federation has fought for and won, also come under the spell of the generously outgoing and socially sensitive attitudes that are the distinguishing trademarks of Federation members. The American Federation of Teachers exists for the sole purpose of humanizing the most important of American institutions—public education.

Teachers are workers. They stand for the dignity of work and the dignity of the worker. They will fight for the right to engage in associated activity with other organized labor groups. If the American Federation of Teachers is not growing fast enough, year after year, the remedy is not to weaken our ties with organized labor but to strengthen them.

Workers are the first line of defense of public education and organized workers have led the way. They understand the power that lies in tax-supported schools and colleges to break down divisions of social class thus making for greater social mobility. Tax-supported schools are the most effective instrument our country has, to make for an open-ended society, and workers are the first ones to know it and to believe it.

The answer to the charge that the Federation is tied to organized labor is to build yet stronger ties with the masses of workers who are our principal supporters.

'We Live in Words'

Teaching is still, for many of us, a talking rather than a doing occupation. We live in words, not deeds, for the most part. When a grievance case comes before us, we tend, because of an occupational inclination of long standing, to require a clear definition of the problem before we undertake a protesting action. Or else we insist on getting all the facts before making a decision to act. Teachers just love clear definitions.

Can you hear them saying: "Define your terms!" "State the problem clearly before you begin!" "Get the facts before you draw conclusions!" I can hear teachers in the classroom making these statements again and again. Such statements are surely emphatic but they are philosophic ineptitudes.

They are based on a mistaken notion of scientific method. Scientific inquiry does not begin with the facts. Facts are the outcome, not the raw material of inquiry. And the same thing is true of a clear definition of the problem. For the most part we don't see the problem until we have arrived at the solution. I am speaking of real problems and not pseudo problems.

I have sometimes thought that, in union matters, our insistence on clarity is another way of retreating from the scene of action. Words are, all too often, an apology for a course of inaction. I am sure that careful deliberation is necessary before wise action can be undertaken, but I am equally sure that nothing serves to clarify thinking like vigorous and aggressive action.

Don't wait until all the facts are in. They never are. There is nothing that equals prompt and effective protest in stopping abusive practices in a school, for 1) the full story after a complete investigation may uncover malpractices more widespread than our first suspicions and 2) the protest, even when only partially justified, becomes a deterrent to further abuse.

Members Make History

If there is one thing that I would like the delegates assembled here to report to their locals on their return home it is this; the Federation is on the move as never before. Our teachers don't just teach history, they have made history this past year. We believe that in a free society man makes his own history, man shapes his own destiny. It is proper that the future of America should be shaped by those who are educated, the teachers who have fought and won their places as equal partners in the educational enterprise.

The New York City teachers have won the right to collective bargaining. They have fought the battle of the picket line and won that too. By the way, what were the New York City university professors doing while the school teachers were fighting for their rights as free Americans? I haven't heard. Instead of sending school teachers to the professors I should send the professors to learn from the teachers.

We shall not always claim brilliant victories. It is the struggle that strengthens. The American Federation of Teachers has embarked on a course of action, which will result in the emancipation of public education from a tradition which has held teachers and children alike in the bonds of ignominious servitude. I repeat: only a teacher who is himself free is fit to teach the meaning of freedom to the young. . . .

Long Island Music Teacher Reinstated by High Court

LEVITTOWN, L.I., N.Y.—Mrs. Valerie Moser, a tenure music teacher, was ordered reinstated in her Levittown high school position with back pay by the New York State Court of Appeals, in a unanimous decision by the judges.

The decision upheld one by the State Supreme (lower) Court. (American Teacher, Sept., 1962) Mrs. Moser was fired in May, 1961, by the Levittown board on unsubstantiated charges of neglect of duty and insubordination.

Her case was supported in the courts by the Levittown Federation of Teachers, Local 1383; the Empire State Federation of Teachers, and the American Federation of Teachers.

Back salary due her is estimated in excess of $8,000. Dan Sanders, regional field director of the State Federation, said the case is estimated to have cost the taxpayers in excess of $10,000, and added:

"It is a shame that the school board did not utilize these funds for needed services for the children, but rather chose to involve itself in the litigation."

Board Anti-Union

Ernest Fleischman, the unions' attorney for Mrs. Moser, said that the unanimous court decision demonstrates that the case was "a manifestation of the board's political motivations which are anti-union and anti-teacher."

Following the high court decision, Mrs. Moser announced her readiness to resume teaching in her interrupted position."

School Board Nervous After Firing Levittown President

LEVITTOWN, L.I., N.Y.—The Empire State Federation of Teachers and the Levittown Federation of Teachers, Local 1383, announced they will go to court to secure the reinstatement of Joseph H. Tessier, Local 1383 president, in his teaching position.

Tessier was fired by the Levittown school board on charges he and the unions declare false—that he tried to date an unidentified high school girl. Union leaders claim he was discharged because of his union activity.

Offers to Dismiss

During a 3-day hearing, board attorneys appeared nervously willing to drop the case as suggested by Ernest Fleischman, the union's lawyer who carried the Valerie Moser case from the same city to a successful conclusion. Story above.

Board Attorney Wexler asked Fleischman whether the case could be settled without going further. Fleischman replied, "Yes, by reinstatement of Tessier with full back pay."

Dan Sanders, ESFT regional field director, said School Supt. Blumberg refuses to agree with the attorneys and offered Tessier a one-year sabbatical with pay if the teacher would then resign. Tessier refused.

Continuation of Attitude

Sanders declared that the Tessier case is "a continuation of the board's and administration's attitude toward teachers, demonstrated by the Moser case." He added:

"It is this attitude that causes the widespread resentment, high faculty turnover and other problems that plague the Levittown school system."

Joliet College, High Teachers Win More Pay

JOLIET, Ill.—Salaries $100 to $400 higher have been negotiated for the 1963-64 school year by the Will County Federation of Teachers, Local 604, for Joliet Township High School and Junior College teachers.

The Bachelors, Masters and Doctors lanes will start $100 higher, as will a Masters plus 30 hours. A 13-year Bachelors step is $400 higher, as is the Masters and Doctors at 15 years.

Paul O. Johnson, editor of 604 Local Notes, pointed out that 21 and 26-year steps were also increased, and that the schedule now runs from $5,300 for a beginning Bachelor to $10,500 for a Doctor in 26 years.

Sick leave was extended 30 days for prolonged illness and convalescence. For first year teachers this would mean a total of 40 days possible leave.

For teachers in the system nine years, it would mean 120 days. Another gain was the granting of one day leave for personal emergency.

ESFT in Long Island Drive For Bargaining

JAMAICA, N. Y. (From the Long Island Press)—The Empire State Federation of Teachers' drive to bring collective bargaining to all Long Island teachers moves forward with the formal opening of an office in Hicksville.

Located at 268 North Broadway, the office will serve as headquarters in the union drive. The ESFT is an affiliate of the American Federation of Teachers.

Daniel Sanders, the group's regional director, said: "Collective bargaining for teachers means democratic participation in school policy.

"Such participation by teachers will usher in a new era in education in which the classroom teacher will play a role greater than that of the educational hucksters selling machines and gadgets."

Chicago Credit Union Reports Growing Assets

CHICAGO, Ill.—The Union Teachers Credit Union of this city which performs the services its name implies, now has total assets of $5,964,147.19, according to a report submitted by Royce Kinnick, its treasurer, at its 32nd annual meeting.

The report showed an income for the year of $472,921 from interest on loans, investments and other items. Members totaling 8,835 had an average shares balance of $635.22.

Nearly 4,000 borrowers had an average loan balance of $1,072.27 each. The credit union serves union teachers of Chicago.

Illinois High Court Upholds Supplementary Pension Law

SPRINGFIELD, Ill.—The constitutionality of the supplementary payments fund created by the 1961 Illinois legislature for retired teachers on low pensions was upheld shortly before press time by the Illinois Supreme Court.

Mr. Ligtenberg

The decision was in a suit brought by taxpayers for an injunction against disbursement of the funds to the beneficiaries intended by the legislature. The law was defended by the Illinois State Retirement System and the Chicago Pension Fund. (American Teacher, Jan., 1963.)

John Ligtenberg, legal counsel for the Chicago Teachers Union, Local 1, who argued for the law, on behalf of the union and the Retired Teachers Association of Chicago, estimated that the decision will add $2-to-$3 million annually to pensions of Chicago and Illinois teachers.

$5 Contributions Key

Attorneys supporting the fund pointed out in pre-decision arguments that retired teachers had to make contributions of $5 for each year of service in order to become eligible for the additional benefits under the law.

Basing its decision on previous rulings obtained with aid of the American Federation of Teachers, the court held that the $5 per year contribution created a new contract and it was immaterial whether teachers originally entered the system involuntarily as charged by the taxpayers.

Quoting from several previous decisions, the court said: "The relations between voluntary contributors and the sovereign being contractual, it follows that the rights created are not measured by the rights of pensioners. They are similar, and amount in effect, to insurance contracts providing annuities upon maturity of the contract or policy of insurance."

Moral Obligation Sufficient

The court also pointed out that a moral obligation was sufficient to sustain increased pension payments, and emphasized that it had many times held that a classification of public school teachers as a distinct class for appropriate legislation cannot be successfully challenged.

Ligtenberg called the decision "sweeping" and said it seemed to answer all possible questions with regard to the "validity of this type of legislation;" also, he predicted that the decision will be influential in other states.

Should Teachers Strike?

By Edward A. Irwin*

"Should teachers strike?"

The answer to that particular question is simple and clear, even for a president of a Local of the teachers' union. The answer is no.

But if it were to be phrased in another manner, such as, "Should teachers be prohibited from striking?" then that would be a question of another color. The answer to the second question would be, of course, the same unequivocal no.

Nor is there a dichotomy in such a position. Teachers shouldn't strike, but then conditions shouldn't ever be so bad that they have to strike, or even want to strike. Yet, quite obviously, conditions have been bad enough and teachers have gone on strike.

To consider such action by teachers a national calamity, as have some editorial writers and AFT opponents, is merely to take refuge in the comfortable illusion that nice people never have to take forceful action, and we're all nice people, aren't we?

Apparently forgotten is the fact that the right to strike is one of the trademarks of a free society. You do not hear of many strikes in totalitarian lands, but you do note that the rights of a free labor movement are among the first to be swept aside when a despot gains power.

There are those who say striking is perfectly all right for the working man and people of that ilk, but I'm a professional. Aside from the point that teachers do work, and most of them work very hard, this snob approach would deny teachers the rights held by the mainstream of American society, including a lot of other professionals.

There are those associations that have decried the use of the strike in the educational field. In effect, these associations have told boards of education:

"No matter what you do to the teachers of this district—no matter what you pay us, no matter what working conditions you impose, no matter how many hours or days you force us to work, no matter how you insult us, we will never, never withhold our services, not even for a single day."

For an organization that purports to represent teachers to thus throw away in advance any bargaining strength they may have is sheer idiocy.

The answer to the problem of striking is, of course, collective bargaining. Far from causing strikes, collective bargaining can prevent them. Under collective bargaining teachers can negotiate from a position of more equal power, instead of merely as supplicants. These negotiations can result in a contract that is not just one-sided, a contract that sets forth mutually agreed conditions of employment and salary.

Under one condition only should the right to strike be given up. It can be relinquished If there is a collective bargaining agreement that calls for an adequate guarantee that disputes will be settled in (for both sides) an objective manner, such as through compulsory arbitration.

Meanwhile, let it not be said that the AFT is advocating a strike. Far from it. The AFT is advocating collective bargaining, a peaceful approach to attaining goals with fairness and dignity.

Education and Income

Accent on College

For the country as a whole, the average (median) income of families in 1961 was about $5,700; but for families headed by college graduates, the average was $9,300, according to estimates released by the Bureau of the Census, Department of Commerce.* The all-family average was $120, or 2 per cent, higher than in 1960. Consumer prices rose during this period by about 1 per cent; therefore, any increase in family income greater than this amount represented a net gain in purchasing power for the average family.

Average family income has nearly doubled in the postwar period (from $3,000 in 1947 to about $5,700 in 1961). However, consumer prices have risen substantially during the period so that only three-fifths of the increase in current-dollar incomes represented an increase in purchasing power. In terms of constant (1961) dollars, average family income increased from about $4,100 in 1947 to $5,700 in 1961, a rise that averaged approximately $120 a year over this period.

The number of families with money incomes below $3,000 in 1961, although unchanged from the previous year, has decreased markedly since 1947. About 10 million families received money incomes under $3,000 in 1961. This represented a drop of about 8½ million since 1947. In relative terms, the proportion of families in the cash income range under $3,000 has decreased from one-half in 1947 to about one-fifth in 1961.

Average family income in 1961 ranged from a low of $4,800 for families headed by elementary school graduates who had no additional education, to $6,300 for families headed by persons who completed high school but went no further, to a high of $9,300 for the 10 per cent headed by college graduates.

Teacher Public Relations

By William J. McLean*

It has become increasingly apparent in recent years that the proposals for teachers' salary adjustments have been meeting more and more opposition from the taxpaying citizenry. One important reason for this opposition from the community, we feel, is that we as teachers have woefully neglected the very important aspect of good public relations.

It is true that teachers need an improved salary situation. We all know it, but have we been selling this premise to our fellow citizens? . . .

Perhaps a new approach is needed; this is where good public relations enters the picture. Do we let people know what it takes to become a teacher, the long years of study and training, the expense involved? Have we ever publicized the work a teacher does, that our job involves more than five hours a day? Are the people aware of the myriad duties we must perform and the innumerable activities in which we take an active part? Is the public informed about the community activities of many teachers?

To these questions we say the answer is a resounding No. We feel that if the citizens were more cognizant of these facts they would give us their unqualified support in our proposals.

To alleviate this situation, the Springfield Federation of Teachers is now preparing a series of articles for publication in the public press. These articles will give the public a different impression of us as teachers and of our needs. We feel that this series will go a long way toward improving our public relations and that we, as well as the city, will benefit from a better community attitude toward us.

The President's Column

By Carl J. Megel

IT HAS LONG BEEN the contention of the American Federation of Teachers that teachers have the right to join the organization of their choice without coercion and intimidation of any kind. We presently emphasize this democratic right because in a recent address before the American Association of School Administrators, a representative of the California Education Association encouraged school administrators to prevent—he almost said, in any way possible—unionization of teachers.

We are pleased that his plea produced a negative reaction among many of the enlightened school administrators who were in attendance. Unfortunately, throughout the nation, all too many school superintendents and principals still impose their will in a most undemocratic fashion among teachers to join the various education associations. In so doing, they always emphasize the teachers' obligation to be "professional," a requirement which they say, is satisfied by joining the "professional organization."

We in the American Federation of Teachers maintain that it is the teacher who makes the organization "professional." Membership in an organization does not make the teacher "professional." Nevertheless, it is this self-acclaimed professionalism that is applied as a pressure point; sometimes in ruthless fashion, to obtain 100 per cent membership.

Through these undemocratic methods, teachers are made to feel guilty if they do not affiliate with the self-styled "professional organizations," but which in reality are only "company union" education associations.

IN THE AFT, all 17 members of the Executive Council are classroom teachers. In contrast, while the National Education Association has a membership composed of 92 per cent classroom teachers and only 8 per cent school administrators, the 8 per cent are represented on the NEA board of directors with 56 members; whereas, the 92 per cent are represented by only 31 members. It is obvious that these 56 administrative representatives determine the policy of the organization.

It is for this reason that the NEA is not competent to honestly and effectively represent classroom teachers. And it is for this very reason that the AFL-CIO, at its 1957 convention, named the NEA, its state and local affiliates, "in effect, a company union." Whenever the interest of the classroom teacher conflicts with administrative interest, classroom teachers get the short end. A few recent events are proof of this assertion.

In New Mexico, the New Mexico Federation of Teachers introduced legislation which would have strengthened their tenure law, and a bill which would have increased teacher retirement benefits. Under date of March 27, 1963, the Albuquerque Federation News contained a guest editorial by Senator Morgan, chairman of the senate education committee for the State of New Mexico. In this editorial, the Senator said:

"Many teachers are asking why some legislation was not enacted into law. Two measures were introduced that would have been of great benefit to the classroom teachers of New Mexico, and would have cost very little. One would have increased retirement benefits for teachers. The other would have given more protection for teachers against unjust dismissal.

Both measures were opposed by the New Mexico Education Association. It is hard to reconcile that position with the supposed stand of that organization when the welfare of teachers is involved."

THE TEACHERS of New Mexico are not the only teachers deprived of tenure protection because of the opposition of the education association—company union. The state Federations of teachers in both Iowa and Missouri, under our direction and in consultation with our attorney, John Ligtenberg, introduced bills which would have provided tenure laws for these two states. In spite of the fact that most teachers in these two states have no job security protection whatsoever, the Federations' tenure bills were opposed by the education associations in both states.

A communication received from Missouri states: "there was a great deal of underground opposition from the Missouri Education Association." As a result, tenure bills in the two states were defeated.

Here in the state of Illinois, the same kind of teacher misrepresentation is practiced by the company union. An official of the Illinois Education Association was reported to have said he was on his way to Springfield to bring pressure on the legislature to defeat the union collective bargaining bill.

WE ARE GREATLY encouraged that daily, more and more teachers become aware that only the American Federation of Teachers is capable of serving the needs of the classroom teachers; whether these needs are in reference to salaries, to retirement pensions, to job security and tenure, to sick leave, to class size, to working conditions, or to the establishment of collective bargaining.

We have organized ten new Locals during the past month. May I encourage each of you to participate in our membership campaign, and to make the slogan "every member get a member" a reality in your own Local.

The Two Big Teacher Groups Move Closer Together; A Merger Is Far Off, but More Cooperation Isn't

By ELLIOT CARLSON
Staff Reporter of THE WALL STREET JOURNAL

WASHINGTON—After years of squabbling, the National Education Association and the American Federation of Teachers are forging new state and local ties that are turning the longtime rivals into friends.

The contacts are raising a possibility once viewed as remote: nationwide merger between the 1.1 million-member NEA and the 275,000-member AFT.

Such a merger isn't going to happen right away. Current NEA policy forbids its leadership from entering into merger negotiations. The bylaws of the AFT, an AFL-CIO affiliate, also limit the extent to which its top men can make such moves. But both organizations have gone on record to permit—and in some cases assist—mergers on a state and local basis. The trend is picking up so much steam that some experts believe the groups' ruling powers may eventually have to change their policy and consider a national tie whether they want to or not.

Although there is disagreement in each headquarters, the heads of both organizations view a full merger is inevitable. "There'll be a wedding, whether it's shotgun or not," AFT President David Selden recently predicted. Adds NEA head Donald Morrison: "I think you'll see this come about within three years. Teachers are getting fed up fighting each other and having school boards play one group off against the other."

The movement may receive a big boost later this month when the results are announced of a statewide merger vote by members of both groups' New York State affiliates—the 105,000-member New York State Teachers Association and the 90,000-member United Teachers of New York State. If backed by rank-and-filers, the merger proposal would probably be formally ratified at conventions of the two organizations next month.

If approved, the New York teachers merger will be the fourth since 1969, when the two organizations' Flint, Mich., affiliates joined forces. Since then, combinations have been forged in Los Angeles and, earlier this year, Gibraltar, Mich.

Talks Elsewhere

Merger talks are under way or about to begin elsewhere, too. After three months of negotiations, affiliates in New Orleans have worked out a tentative merger agreement. Talks may begin shortly in Rhode Island. Informal discussions have been held in Michigan. And recently, the Illinois Education Association called for immediate talks with the Illinois Federation of Teachers to resolve "organizational rivalries and competition for membership."

"Any such (state or local) merger enhances the chance of merger at the national level," says the NEA's Mr. Morrison.

Spurring the trend is what some educators view as the "anti-education mood" of state legislatures. "We're threatened with more attacks on public education these days," says Thomas Hobart, president of the New York State Teachers Association. He cites two examples: The New York legislature last year put a moratorium on sabbatical leaves for college professors and extended the probationary period during which teachers can be summarily dismissed.

To head off such moves, "teachers should speak with one voice and mount unified lobbying efforts," he argues.

Another factor prompting teachers to do just that is the short supply of cash for schools. School financing was once left primarily to local school districts, but with districts increasingly strapped for funds, the state legislatures and the federal government are being called upon to play a larger financing role. This means, say teachers, that in the future they not only will have to lobby in Washington but also will have to bargain more frequently on a statewide basis for salaries and fringe benefits, rather than solely with local school districts.

Clout and Money

"Schools simply need more money," declares Blanche Erst, president of the NEA's Illinois affiliate. "And to get it teachers will have to acquire more clout in the legislature. This will take collective effort."

Even without merging, some NEA and AFT affiliates are cooperating increasingly in the face of what they view as legislative assaults. Early this year, leaders of the Teachers Association of Baltimore County, an NEA body, and the AFT's Baltimore Teachers Union began meetings aimed at dealing with such alleged threats. Already, the two groups have helped stymie a bill in the Maryland legislature that would have eliminated tenure provisions for teachers in public schools.

The Baltimore talks have steered away from the merger question. But the issue is expected to arise because of a suit filed in federal court in Baltimore that would, like the recent Richmond decision, blur boundaries between suburban and city school districts. The suit has special relevance for Baltimore teachers, as the NEA affiliate represents most suburban teachers while the AFT unit bargains for most in the city.

"If the boundary line goes, there would be a question as to which group would represent all teachers," explains Carroll Miles, president of the NEA affilate. "If the Richmond decision stands, this no doubt will make a merger more likely."

Changing Attitudes

Whatever happens, the historical antiunion attitude among teachers is changing, even if slowly. "For years teachers felt that any link with organized labor would mean a step down to the blue-collar class," says Robert Crowley, executive director of the Orleans Education Association, an NEA affiliate. "And for a long time administrators told teachers they were professionals and shouldn't organize or bargain collectively."

As a result, he claims, teachers in recent years have received few gains in salary or fringe benefits. "We now feel that we've had the wool pulled over our eyes," he says. "So if we merged, teachers could fight the school board instead of each other."

A full merger between the NEA and the AFT won't be easy to achieve. For one thing, the NEA's leadership remains deeply divided on the question. While NEA head Morrison favors merger, he'll be succeeded this July by Mrs. Catharine Barrett, who's cool to the idea.

Also, many members of the NEA, which is strongest in rural and suburban areas, remain distrustful of the AFT, which is strong in big cities and which was the first teachers organization to use the strike weapon. "There's strong opposition among our members to joining a union," says L. P. Sturgeon, executive secretary of the Texas State Teachers Association, an NEA affiliate. "We have an old-fashioned idea that we're a professional organization."

The trouble with the union, he adds, "is that it's far more interested in the personal welfare of teachers than it is in children."

AFT members deny this, and a growing number of NEA members are becoming less inclined to see a conflict between professionalism and union membership. But this conflict, real or not, clearly is the major stumbling block to a national merger. Even NEA forces in favor of merger want the AFT, as a precondition to a full merger, to loosen its ties to the AFL-CIO. This NEA expectation already has complicated some statewide talks in which state AFT leaders are insisting that the NEA group accept ties with the AFL-CIO.

Some AFT members have equally strong doubts about a formal national tie with the NEA. "Many AFT teachers feel we'd lose our militancy if we merged with the NEA," says the AFT's Mr. Selden. "In some cases there's a dislike of the NEA bordering on hatred. On the whole, I think AFT members favor merger, but on their own terms."

FINAL REPORT

Ad Hoc Committee to Study the Desirability of Collective Bargaining

Since the establishment of the Faculty Senate Ad Hoc Committee to Study the Desirability of Collective Bargaining (CB) on 19 February 1970, the members of that committee have been involved in rigorous fact finding. Initially the committee agreed on two things: 1. We knew very little about the "ins and outs" of CB; and 2. most of the committee members were "undecided" as to their personal commitments, re: desirability of CB. In order to replace ignorance and myth with the adequate information upon which to base its final recommendations, re: desirability of CB, the committee did the following things:

1. Investigated the legality of CB for the faculty here at URI. It was determined that under the laws of Rhode Island, as amended, Chapter 36-11 of the State Laws, entitled, "Organization of State Employees," and Section 28-7-45 of the State Laws in 28-7, entitled, "Labor Relations Act," that the faculty is permitted to enter into CB.

2. Studied in detail those contracts in institutions of higher learning where CB is already ongoing. (While there are a number of community colleges and junior colleges that have entered into CB, only those contracts that had been negotiated at institutions of a similar nature to URI were studied.) The various contracts reviewed indicated that institutional uniqueness is provided for in each contract. Even when the representative agency of the faculty of a given institution is a national organization, e.g. NEA, AAUP, or AFT, individual institutional needs were represented in the negotiated contracts. Such individual needs include salaries, teaching loads, space, university governance, curriculum control, sabbatical leave policies, etc.

3. Was represented by one of its members at the three day meeting of the City University of New York, National Conference on Collective Negotiations in Higher Education in New York, 30 April-2 May, 1970.

4. Was represented by one of its committee members who visited Rutgers University campus, November 1970, to interview administrative and faculty representatives on that campus, re: their reactions to CB now that they have gone into CB.

5. Interviewed, as a committee of the whole, representatives of the following organizations that are presently involved in negotiating for faculties in higher education:
   a. AAUP, represented by Matthew Finkin
   b. NEA represented by Ralph Chesebrough
   c. AFT represented by Robert Jensen

6. Analyzed the national trend, re: CB in higher education. Again, we reviewed only those institutions which are similar to URI. The committee learned that five of the twelve institutions in the comparison group of institutions used by the FS Compensation Committee for purposes of establishing reasonable faculty salary requests have already gone into CB. They are Rutgers, represented by AAUP and the four institutions in SUNY, represented by NEA. The faculty at Delaware is presently in the "desirability state" that this committee was Fall, 1970. Thus, six of the twelve institutions with whom we compare ourselves have already gone into CB, or are considering such a step. The committee discovered an increased national trend towards CB among institutions of higher learning, especially in metropolitan areas.

7. Analyzed what events here at URI led towards the consideration of CB. In other words, we rigorously examined the status quo.

After sifting the facts from the opinions and the emotionalism that seems to permeate discussions of CB, the committee reached the following two conclusions:

I. Collective Bargaining is desirable for the faculty here at URI. Our position is based on the following reasons:

A. The history of the FS Compensation Committee reflects a failure on the part of that committee to reach compensation goals. This we determined not to be a fault of the many individuals who labored long and hard these past several years; nor is it the fault of the University administration, past or present, that compensation goals were not realized. Rather, the inability to reach reasonable faculty salary goals rests squarely within the system but outside of the immediate university community. It is the present Board of Regents (and the previous Board of Trustees) who in fact determine faculty salaries. The faculty and the university administration has had no recourse in the past but to accept these faculty salaries. A review of salary "gains" show in fact a regression--or a widening gap. Thus, even though considerable strides have been made over the past several years, on a dollars and cents basis with URI faculty salaries, these salaries when compared to those of similar institutions represent no real gain but actually a loss. After nine years of trying to catch up to the average (an odious concept) we are still not at the mid-way point. Rather, the following is true:

Average Salary Comparison with Northeastern Universities*

	Them	URI	Behind
Professor	$20,001	$17,423	$2,578
Associate Professor	$14,578	$13,484	$1,094
Assistant Professor	$11,526	$10,612	$ 914
Instructor	$ 8,883	$ 8,727	$ 156

*Data presented by Dr. Baum to General Faculty, Fall 1970.
Them: Maine, Vermont, New Hampshire, U. Mass., U. Conn., Delaware, Rutgers, Maryland, SUNY (Buffalo, Albany, Binghampton, Stony Brook.)

Thus, the facts show that the present system permits faculty salary gaps to exist. The Committee believes that CB is a more effective means of closing the salary gap. The URI faculty, through a representative agency, can sit down at a conference table with the Board of Regents (or its representative) as equals. This the Committee believes desirable.

B. We feel that CB would make possible the increase in compensation for Extension teaching, endorsed in principle by both faculty and administration but never yet realized in fact. CB is an instrument through which the increase in compensation can be realized. This we deem desirable.

C. We feel, as a committee, the time has come when the faculty can no longer be asked to underwrite the increasing costs of higher education. Rather we feel that like all other professionals, we should be paid the salary our services merit. To date this has not been the case. CB can reverse this.

D. The committee believes that CB can prohibit the kinds of unilateral decision-making concerning faculty salaries that were made by Commissioner Burke to the Board of Regents, and endorsed by the Board of Regents at its 28 January 1971 meeting. Chancellor Dennis left on file in the Commissioner's office that report which the former Chancellor in consultation with the COP prepared, re: a recommendation for faculty salaries 1971-73. For whatever reasons the Commissioner elected not to use these projections even as guidelines when making his recommendations for URI faculty salaries, 28 January 1971. (As a matter of record, the Commissioner, for whatever reasons, elected not to confer with the President of URI immediately prior to making his recommendations 28/1/71.) Rather than continuing to permit the Board of Regents to base their decisions, re: URI faculty needs, on recommendations that are not in fact the result of close and sensitive relationship between the faculty and the Commissioner. The Committee believers that direct negotiations with (go to page 4).

the Board of Regents (or its representative) would be far more desirable. CB can therefore eliminate having the Commissioner act as a "spokesman" to the Board for URI faculty salaries. Based on what we witnessed this past month, the committee views such a change as highly desirable.

E. The committee believes that CB can serve to complement the Faculty Senate. It is obvious to the committee members that the only major weakness of the present Faculty Senate is in its inability to realize reasonable faculty salaries and other monetary fringe benefits. CB and the Faculty Senate as dual instruments of the general faculty can work together to reflect the professional goals and aspirations of the faculty here at the University. Thus the desirability of CB.

F. The committee feels very strongly that CB would prohibit the kinds of "policy decisions" re: promotions, presently being discussed by the administration here at URI. The policy decision presently being determined by the administration is whether faculty members should be promoted if their promotions would in fact lower the salary average in the next higher faculty rank. To prohibit a man or woman from an earned promotion in order to make URI salary averages "look good" by rank is abhorrent. A review of the data of the FS Compensation Committee reveals that URI faculty members, by percentage of total faculty in each of the ranks is in fact "out of line" with the twelve other institutions. Looking at the rank of full Professor we noted that the percentage based on the 1970 AAUP data, of total faculty in this rank, as compared with our twelve other institutions is below the average of those institutions. Specifically: "Them" 26.2% Full Professors, URI 22.5% Full Professors. In addition it must be noted that the salary for rank of full Professor (based on the 1970 figures) is $2,578 less than the average. What does this mean? It means that we stand third from the bottom of the twelve institutions, re: average salary for full Professors. Thus by both percentage of faculty in rank of full Professor and salary paid to those individuals there is no evidence to indicate that we're overly generous with either our promotion or salary policy. Rather, evidence indicates we're just the reverse; parsimonious. And the evidence also reveals that URI faculty salaries over all when compared to "Them" show us third from the bottom. Thus to consider a policy of promotion based on salary considerations threatens promotions to all ranks. For the administration to "determine policy" concerning promotions on any other basis than earned professional recognition is intolerable. If it is the salary average that is causing the administration to even consider a policy whereby salary might limit the number of total faculty promoted, the Committee believes that CB can bring salary averages "into line" and individual faculty members would (go to page 5).

then be reviewed for promotion on the basis of professional criteria, not dollars and cents.

G. While CB will cost each individual faculty member some money the committee views such costs as an investment in one's financial well-being. The committee cannot determine what the annual cost for CB will be until the faculty at large determines which agency will represent them (AAUP, NEA, AFT). What the committee members do know is that on the basis of those institutions that have already gone into CB, the costs of CB will be in the neighborhood of twenty to twenty-five cents a day--or put more "brutally" seventy-five to one hundred dollars ($75.00 to $100.00)per year. In view of the gains than can be realized through CB, the committee believes that the cost is worth it.

Recommendation #1: The FS Ad Hoc Committee to Study the Desirability of Collective Bargaining requests that the Faculty Senate recommend that the faculty of the University of Rhode Island enter into collective bargaining with the Board of Regents or the legally determined representative of the citizens of Rhode Island.

II. The Second Conclusion reached by the committee concerns agencies involved in CB.

Through its year of deliberation, the Ad Hoc Committee to Study the Desirability of Collective Bargaining learned a great deal about those agencies equipped to represent faculties in higher education. Three such organizations were examined closely: AAUP, AFT and NEA.

A. American Association of University Professors (AAUP):

As noted earlier in this report, the committee met with a representative of national AAUP. While AAUP has always been an organization dedicated almost exclusively to the interests of higher education, it has only recently become involved in CB. As late as Spring 1970 national AAUP had no firm policy regarding CB even though it endorses CB. Thus, the committee concluded that this particular organization was not sufficiently experienced to assist the faculty at URI in CB.

B. American Federation of Teachers (AFT):

While the American Federation of Teachers has been extremely active in the area of CB, its experiences have been largely with Elementary and Secondary education and some junior colleges. When meeting with the representative of AFT (go on to page 6).

the committee found many of the questions it asked were answered in terms of what AFT did in a given school system with a given school board. The committee felt that AFT lacked both the experience and the focus in higher education to be effective for the URI faculty as a representative organization.

C. National Education Association (NEA) - Rhode Island Educational Association (RIEA):

After meeting with the representatives of NEA, the committee was convinced that this organization could best represent the URI faculty. NEA has a strong national organization which has devoted much time and talent to CB in higher education. NEA's involvement in CB in higher education has resulted in that organization representing more (and better) institutions with the greatest number of faculty than any other organization. Thus, nationally NEA is the most active and effective organization.

Turning now to an additional advantage, NEW has a state organization, Rhode Island Educational Association (RIEA). RIEA can offer the URI faculty such tangible assistance as legal advice, negotiating help, lobbying and publicity. RIEA has already had considerable "exposure" to CB problems here in Rhode Island as it represents thrity-one of the thirty-nine school districts.

Thus when considering that organization most experienced nationally in the area of CB, the philosophy that brought into being the Board of Regents, the problems of education peculiar to the state of Rhode Island, the financial climate here in R.I., etc., the committee believes NEA-RIEA the group best able to protect the interests of the faculty here at URI.

D. Another alternative is possible: no outside organization. The law permits the URI faculty to set up its own organization for purposes of CB. However, the committee believes that the evidence clearly indicates that such an alternative would be very undesirable. The expense of this would be prohibitive--that is, the URI faculty would have to retain its own lawyer, be responsible for drawing up the terms of the contract, negotiating its own contract, etc., without the expertise of a larger, more affluent and more experienced organization. After viewing such an alternative, the committee concluded that the faculty should affiliate with a representative organization.

Recommendation #2: The FS Ad Hoc Committee to Study the Desirability of CB requests that the Faculty Senate Chairman transmit this report to President Baum with the request that Dr. Baum call a General Faculty meeting within thirty days to discuss Collective Bargaining.

Georgia Stewards At RWDSU [Retail, Wholesale, and Dept. Store Union] Training School

AUGUSTA, Ga.

Forty-five members of four locals of the RWDSU Council of Georgia attended the Council's second annual meeting, which was combined with a training school, at the Augusta Town House Feb. 8 and 9.

"It was an overwhelming success," said Charlotte Whitlock, Council secretary.

Delegates representing Locals 315 and 343, Atlanta, Local 339, Macon, and Local 586 in Augusta participated in the two-day program.

The training school, on oral communication, was held on Saturday. Margaret Robbins of the Alabama RWDSU Council served as coordinator, and Jim Battles of the University of Alabama extension division was the instructor. The Council's education committee—made up of Jim Adams, chairman; Willie Bussey, Andy Thornton, Dorothy Bryant and Miss Whitlock—helped prepare the program.

The Council's annual meeting was held the following day, with RWDSU Vice-Pres. Frank Parker as main speaker. Parker encouraged the delegates to continue their participation in various union activities.

Reaction is lukewarm to 'CB' bill

WASHINGTON, D.C.

With great fanfare and a packed press conference of unhappy reporters, the National Education Association announced here April 7 that it had obtained congressional sponsorship of a bill providing federal legislation on collective bargaining for teachers. The reporters went away mad because NEA spokesmen refused to tell them who the sponsors in Congress were.

"We're not ready to identify them," said NEA Executive Secretary Sam Lambert. John Lumley, assistant executive secretary for legislation and federal relations, said that he had made an agreement not to reveal the names. "They will announce this themselves after Easter recess," he said.

The proposed law provides for legislation of teacher strikes, under certain conditions, but it also is strongly slanted toward giving the NEA the edge in, as NEA attorney Robert Chanin said, those "whole sections of the country in which teachers do not have the basic rights of other workers."

AFT President David Selden commented that the NEA announcement "has a certain amount of educational value so far as teachers are concerned." He added: "We hope, however, that the NEA announcement is more than a tactic to divert attention away from the failures of its state associations.

"The NEA-affiliated state associations," Selden continued, "have frequently opposed proposed laws which would make it possible for teachers to negotiate with school boards and superintendents. This is particularly so in the case of the state affiliates of the NEA, such as those in Minnesota, California, and Oregon, which have enacted, with association support, laws which restrict the right of teachers to bargain, and in the 35 states which do not have any legislation on this subject.

"The unilateral action of NEA indicates the weakness stemming from its failure to respond positively to our offers to build a united teaching profession. We urge the NEA to meet with us at once," Selden said, "to match strategy for achieving legislation in every state which would accomplish

1,500 New Orleans teachers go on strike for right to vote

NEW ORLEANS, La.

An estimated 1,500 classroom teachers were heading into the second week of their strike here as the American Teacher went to press.

Demanding the right to vote in a secret-ballot collective-bargaining representation election, the teachers had shut down an estimated 30 schools and had set up picketlines at school buildings throughout the city. Success of their walkout would make New Orleans the first city in the Deep South to have bargaining rights secured for teachers.

PETITION IGNORED

The teachers, led by the Orleans Parish Local 527 of the American Federation of Teachers, walked out on Thursday, April 3, after board of education officials had ignored a petition signed by a majority of the city's classroom teachers demanding that an election be scheduled.

"We have pleaded with the board for years, we have shown them that collective-bargaining is not only legal in Louisiana, but highly desirable as a means to create a better school system," said Mrs. Veronica Hill, Local 527 president. "But the adamance of the five-member board in not listening to its teachers has forced us to take this militant action." (Two years ago, New Orleans teachers were forced out in a similar strike.)

The walkout, reported Mrs. Hill, has resulted in widespread community support. Many ministers and church groups have offered assistance to the local, and many parents' organizations view an AFT victory as a vehicle to better education, she said.

The Federation is one of four teacher organizations in the city. There are, in addition, two racially segregated affiliates of the National Education Association, and a small independent group. Federation membership in the city surpasses the combined total of the other three groups—"probably explaining why the board refuses to grant an election," Mrs. Hill said. "They know that we would win it."

DAILY RALLIES HELD

Since the strike began, daily rallies, with large, enthusiastic turnouts, have been held. The national office of the AFT has deployed more than 20 national representatives and field representatives to the city to aid in the campaign.

Kenneth Miesen, AFT national representative who has been in charge of the campaign, said picketing would continue until the teachers' demands are met despite an implied threat by lame-duck Supt. Carl Dolce to penalize the strikers.

AFT President David Selden flew to New Orleans for a press conference, telling reporters that a Federation victory was essential for educational progress in the city. Also on hand at the scene was James Mundy, director of organization for the AFT.

AFT President David Selden and Legislative Director Carl Megel prepare to testify before the House subcommittee on higher education. Selden called the laws requiring a cutoff of federal aid to disruptive college students a "step toward neo-McCarthyism."

Student unions seen as answer to turmoil

WASHINGTON, D.C.

Free, autonomous, broad-based, multiracial student unions which could negotiate with college authorities were suggested as an answer to current campus turmoil by AFT President David Selden here last month.

"If such unions were developed on a credible, self-governing basis, students would have a peaceful outlet for legitimate protests," the AFT president said.

Selden made his proposal as he wound up his testimony before a special House subcommittee looking into the question of cutting off federal financial aid to disruptive college students. He told the subcommittee, chaired by Rep. Edith Green (D.-Ore.), that Paragraph 504(a) of the 1968 Higher Education Act, which singles out for punitive action students who receive federal assistance, should be repealed.

(The legislation was passed a year ago. Last month, HEW Secretary Robert Finch reminded colleges and universities that they were obligated to deny aid to students guilty of disruption, but left the matter up to local enforcement.)

Selden was supported by the president of the academic senate at San Francisco State College, who followed him in the witness' chair, and by several members of the subcommittee, who said they shared his views.

Much of the special subcommittee's attention has been focused on the events at San Francisco State, scene of recent student and teachers' strikes. The subcommittee's first witness was S. I. Hayakawa, acting president of SFSC.

Selden said the AFT opposed Paragraph 504(a) for several basic reasons:

• "The legislation is an unwarranted interference in local affairs by the federal government." (Selden said it was improper for a committee of Congress to intervene in a local matter like that at San Francisco State and implied that

24 resign at CCNY

NEW YORK, N.Y.

Twenty-three of the 27 academic chairmen at City College of New York (one of CUNY's campuses) have joined Dr. Buell G. Gallagher in submitting their resignations to the board of higher education here.

The resignations were in protest to Gov. Rockefeller's budget cuts (see story, Page 15). Gallagher said the cuts would make it impossible for the institution to admit a freshman class in September.

AFT salary survey stirs national reaction

WASHINGTON, D.C.

When AFT President David Selden and Assistant Research Director John Oliver presented the conclusions of the AFT's 1969 salary survey at a routine press conference, there was only a handful of reporters present.

But the report—which shows that teachers' pay increases have not kept up with the increased cost of living—has gained nationwide publicity since its release. (See January American Teacher for a full report.) National stories were carried on the major wire services, and the influential Bureau of National Affairs reprinted the survey summary in full.

The AFT survey declares:

• The average salary paid the classroom teacher was $6,830 for the 1966-67 school year, compared with $11,697 as of March, 1967, for all heads of families with a college degree.

• In general, teachers have made unimpressive gains toward achieving the kind of financial reward necessary to build toward "nationwide educational excellence."

• The startling regional and sectional disparities in teachers' pay have not been significantly improved. Starting salaries for the bachelor's degree holder range from $4,400 to $7,500.

• When one considers inflation and higher taxes, the beginning teacher is no better off today than the beginner a year ago.

• The intolerable gap between the salaries for teaching in the public schools and other professions in business and industry has not improved.

• Salaries, fringe benefits, and other economic benefits paid teachers add up to an income that is lower by 30-40 percent, on the average, than the U.S. Department of Labor's recommended income for a "moderate" standard of living for a family of four.

• Some brighter revelations of the survey are reflected in the very distinct salary gains in areas where AFT locals are the collective-bargaining agents. AFT locals have negotiated salary increases far ahead of the NEA affiliates.

• Despite these gains, won by increased teacher militancy, they are wholly inadequate when one considers the constant erosion caused by inflation and higher taxes at all levels of government, and the persistent gap between teachers' salaries in public education (the nation's most valuable growth-producing industry) and other professional and clerical workers in the private sector.

Minot, N.D., teachers meet in a local union hall for a report on the progress of their strike April 9. Shortly after the meeting began, a sheriff's deputy appeared to serve more than 130 individual injunctions on the strikers. As each was served, an ovation was given by the rest of the teachers. AFT National Representative Robert Crosier is speaking. (Full report, Page 4.)

the broad objectives the NEA announces it supports."

The NEA admitted at its press conference that it did not have the full support of its state associations on the subject of federal legislation, and that it had not consulted its membership as a whole. It had not consulted other interested organizations, either, Chanin said, when asked if the NEA had spoken to such groups as the AFT and the American Federation of State, County, and Municipal Employees. "We have not had specific discussions on specific items of this bill," he said, in partial refutation of his preceding statement that "We have the support of every public employee group in this country."

The bill's main provisions:

- Administration by an impartial agency within the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, consisting of five members appointed by the President.

MEMBERSHIP LIST

- "An employee organization would be able to demonstrate its majority support through a verified membership list or other appropriate evidence. An election would generally be held only when another employee organization claimed majority support and submitted as evidence a verified membership list containing at least 30 percent of the employees in the unit."
- "Strikes would be enjoinable only if they posed a clear and present danger to the public health or safety, or if the employee organization had not attempted to utilize the impasse procedures provided in the statute." These procedures involve mediation by a mediator appointed by the commission; then, if the dispute is not resolved in 15 days, appointment of an arbitrator whose recommendations would be advisory. Or, binding arbitration could be employed if agreed to in the teacher-board contracts, or disputes "in the absence of such procedures, could be submitted by either party to final and binding arbitration in accordance with the rules of the commission."
- It would be unlawful for a board of education to, among other things, deny an employee organization a place to meet, access to work areas, or use of bulletin boards and mailboxes, or refuse to deduct membership dues for an employee organization—"and conversely, once an organization has been recognized as the employees' representative, it would be unlawful for a board to grant those rights to any other employee organization."

Student unions: an answer?

subcommittee members were more interested in headline-grabbing than in seeing the conflict resolved.)

- "There are no guarantees of due process for individuals who may be hurt by this legislation. . . . Inevitably the provision justifies and encourages surveillance of the activities of individual students and student organizations."
- "The legislation is discriminatory on a class and racial basis." He explained, "A high proportion of students receiving federal assistance are nonwhite, and all of those receiving such assistance are poor. This law would wreak a harsh penalty on such students, while the rich remain outside the scope of this section of the law and free to act in any way that they see fit, with only locally imposed penalties to worry about."
- "College regimes are already too authoritarian and Section 504(a) furthers repression of student initiative."

Selden urged members of the subcommittee and Congress to "stop this initial step toward neo-McCarthyism and neo-Hardingism." He noted the parallels between this law and the two periods of suppression of civil liberties in this century—the 1920 Palmer raids and the fear and suspicion of the 1950 McCarthy period.

Pointing out that the AFT is opposed to civil violence by any individual or group and that it supports the principle of negotiation as a dispute-settling mechanism, he urged that any new law "advance negotiation and dispute settlement by college administrators and representatives of their student bodies."

The federal government, he said, "instead of seeking ways to suppress student protest, should actively foster the creation of genuine free and autonomous broad-based, multi-racial student unions, which could engage in orderly negotiations with college authorities. Within such over-all student unions, various caucuses could function to present minority points of view. If such unions were developed on a credible, self-governing basis, students would have a peaceful outlet for legitimate protests."

Chatham Workers Vote For Return Without Contract

Labor News 5-23-69

ELKIN—Striking Chatham Manufacturing Co. workers voted Saturday to return to work at midnight Sunday without a new contract with the company.

The vote came after the negotiating team for Local 1744 of the Textile Workers Union of America recommended the action.

The strike was in its 12th day Saturday.

Scott Hoyman, regional director of the union, said the workers are returning because they have "shown that the union can be a threat to the company's production." The company, which produces bedding and upholstery, has continued its operations.

About 1,800 of the company's 2,200 production employes were striking, said the union.

There were no negotiations during the strike.

At issue, said company officials, was the matter of dues checkoff. A checkoff requires the company to withhold union dues from employes' checks and turn them over to the union.

The union said before the strike was called it would trade the check off for other concessions.

Atlanta Strike

strike:

Atlanta's thirty-six-day-old garbage strike is over. At least in the narrow sense of the word it was a victory for the union, no matter what the Chamber of Commerce says. All the things Massell said he couldn't do–a one-step pay raise, dropping charges against strikers–were done before the strikers went back to work. According to the Union, the pay raise will be granted to 2800 workers. That has been guaranteed by the city and Massell's claim of guarantees for only 2300 is only p.r. for the Chamber of Commerce. In addition, strikers returned to their jobs without prejudice, and strikers have priority to the overtime work resulting from the strike. Massell lost the strike, but the real question is whether the union will be able to turn what most agree is simply a token victory (a one step raise isn't much) into a real victory when negotiations begin again this summer.

It was clear before the vote at the strike vote meeting on Wednesday that the Union had to go back to work. In the first place, only 275 men out of 800 strikers were at the meeting–a sign of weakness. As the discussion of the city's offer began, it was clear from their response to the speakers that about 2/3 of the men wanted to accept the offer. The only problem with the settlement, and it was a very real one, was that strikers would not be paid for their time out. Had the strike been stronger, the Union could have gotten that too–but it wasn't.

The weakness of the strike did not lie with the workers. They held well, came to meetings, and above all were militant as hell most of the time.

One weakness of course was the ease with which the City was able to collect garbage. As long as people brought their garbage to the dumpsters, it took only a few trucks to pick it up.

A more serious problem was the inability of the black community to support the strike wholeheartedly. Some black leaders, like Dr. Middleton from Morris Brown, Bishop Hickman from the A.M.E. Church, the people from the Butler Street Y.M.C.A., Rev. Joe Boone, Ethel Mae Matthews, and Hosea Williams supported the strike all the way. Other, like Leroy Johnson, Rev. King Sr., and Joel Stokes functioned in such a way as to sabotage the strike at several important points. Others, such as Julian Bond, gave only token support and stayed away from the strike. Maynard Jackson's support was crucial but a couple of weeks late. The most militant black paper, The Atlanta Voice, printed late in the strike a full-page ad paid for by the City describing Massell as a friend of the workers.

The fact that it was their boy sitting in the Mayor's chair confused things for the black community. The black community had elected him, his campaign rhetoric promised to deliver the goods, and after all, he was in political debt to them. Surely he would listen to the leaders of the black community. But efforts to reason with Massell only hindered efforts to pull the strike together because everyone kept waiting for the results of the latest effort.

Another factor was the black community's distrust of unions. Unions should be distrusted, particularly by the black community, in light of their record of racism. But the Mayor and those who worked with him were able to use this fear effectively against the Union that offers the most immediate hope to large numbers of black people in Atlanta.

More than that, though, there is the problem of black "leadership" itself. As one black union official put it, "They're all Chieftains and no indians." Each "leader" represents his own institution and they all are in competition with each other. Getting broad support from Atlanta's black leadership is kinda like getting broad support from the Left these days, except that in the black community the form it takes seems to be ego tripping rather than ideological nitpicking. However, it should be remembered that, contrary to reports in the straight press, support in the black community was building as the strike ended.

Support from the white community was minimal. The labor organizations gave money and plenty of endorsements but no help in marches or on the picket line. The only sustained liberal support came from the churches, and only two really helped–Father Austin Ford from Emmaus House and the Catholic Church. Father Dillman set up a strike fund with money supplied by the Archbishop which was used to help pay strikers' bills, and Sister Marie was arrested on the picket line. Even support from the Left was sporadic. Students from Emory picketed at the Northside Drive station for several days straight–but only for several days.

The Union made some mistakes. The most serious was made before the strike started. Like the black community, the Union was tricked by Massell. The one step demand the Union agreed upon without dissention was not a strike demand where you start out high to leave room for negotiation. It was a "reasonable" raise worked out with the city.

When the City forced the Union to strike,they were pretty much stuck with the one step because it's hard to demand in a strike more than you asked for originally.

Once the strike started, the Union continued to think that Massell could be changed behind closed doors. AFSCME area director Mort Shapiro consciously kept civil rights support away from the strike at the beginning "to give Massell a way out of the strike." No demands were made on Jackson at that point because the Union didn't want to mess up Jackson's functioning as vice mayor.

Then Shapiro was forced into the hospital with kidney trouble and the Union's international people came in. Still for another week or so there were no real efforts to develop a program for a long strike. Finally Hosea Williams pulled together the downtown marches and the boycott and thus deserves much of the credit for the success of the strike.

There were other problems with the Union's efforts. It wasn't until late in the strike that the Union made a serious effort to shut down the Northside Drive station where most of the trucks were working from. Had the jails been filled earlier, more pressure might have been put on the black leaders to support the strike. Early in the strike, an effort was made to organize the strikers' wives, but it spon turned into cooking and wives were discouraged from coming to the picket lines. Had the men been unable to shut down a substation, perhaps a line of women could have done so.

From before the strike there was a split in the Union between older, more conservative leadership and the younger militants. In the second week of the strike, some of the conservative members of the negotiating team asked John Wright of the Atlanta Labor Council to set up a meeting with Massell. They did not let the militant staff members of the Union know about the meeting and other members of the negotiating committee learned of the meeting minutes before it occurred. Led by staff member Marvin Bradford, the negotiating committee agreed to an offer of free life insurance and a raise in the minimum wage. The rank and file rejected the offer the next day, but it took a valuable week for the union to overcome the demoralization.

It is hard to run a large strike of public employees and it's hard for underpaid public employees to strike for any length of time. Once the Union got over its illusions about Massell, it ran a good strike, but the real momentum was lost by then and could not be regained.

The strike may have a very good effect on the Union. It may have propelled younger, more militant leadership into the local. If that happened, AFSCME still may develop into the most militant, democratic trade union in Atlanta. If the local allows the old leadership, rank and file and staff to maintain control, it'll be just another union–not so bad, not so good either.

Secretary

File Teamsters

Teamster old guard wins

Appointment of new secretary-treasurer assures status quo in policies, leadership. Defeat of Gibbons may mean this "non-traditionalist" is at the end of the road in union

The recent appointment of Thomas E. Flynn, 62, to the $75,000-a-year job of secretary-treasurer of the International Brotherhood of Teamsters was a significant victory for the union's old guard. Flynn, until his appointment a Teamsters vice-president, now holds down the second highest office in the IBT—and one of the most important in all labor.

Harold J. Gibbons, 58, St. Louis vice-president of the Teamsters, was the big loser as the IBT elevated Flynn, one-time Chicago milk and ice wagon driver, to fill a vacancy created by the death of John F. English last month.

The designation of Flynn practically assures the continuation of the present leadership and basic policies of the union. And, insiders say, it could very well mean that Gibbons, who has had ambitions to move to the top in IBT, has now reached the end of the road in the Teamsters. A board member who attended the meeting that chose Flynn said Gibbons left "licking his wounds."

Anniversary. Flynn will move into his new post on St. Patrick's Day, exactly 33 years after his first appointment to a Teamsters office. On March 17, 1936, the late Daniel J. Tobin named Flynn—then a rank-and-file union member—as a general organizer. He had never held even a local union office when Tobin spotted him as a "comer" at age 20.

Flynn, assigned to South Bend, Ind., proved himself after a year and built a 5,000-member local in less than two years. And in March, 1941, Tobin designated Flynn to be his executive assistant. He has been near the top ever since.

On a basis of seniority, he was fourth vice-president of IBT and an executive board member since 1957. Situated in Washington, he had been head of the Eastern Conference of Teamsters since 1953, with a power base of 600,000 members in 15 states, the District of Columbia, and five eastern Canadian provinces.

He is definitely old guard—in the sense of Teamsters background and traditions. That counts for a lot in the IBT today. Teamsters leaders, from the top down, are wary of changes in the union structure—particularly in their freedom to operate now with considerable autonomy in their bailiwick.

Thomas E. Flynn was elevated to #2 spot after 33 years with the Teamsters.

Gibbons different. Unlike Flynn, Gibbons is not a Teamster in the traditional sense. Rather he is an able union leader whose home base is in CIO-founded warehouse and retail and wholesale trade unions. Gibbons led his St. Louis locals out of the old CIO in a leadership quarrel in his international. For a time, the locals were independent, and then Gibbons took them intact into the Teamsters. Gibbons, an intellectual with views mostly foreign to IBT's old hands, quickly became a power in the union.

In 1957, Flynn picked Gibbons as administrator of Teamsters locals placed under his trusteeship, and when James R. Hoffa nudged Dave Beck out of the IBT presidency, he chose Gibbons as his executive assistant in Washington. For a number of years, the two worked closely and effectively as a team. Eventually, serious strains developed and Gibbons broke with Hoffa and returned to St. Louis.

With the prospects of a prison term ahead for him, Hoffa took steps at the last convention to assure a successor who would be committed to Hoffa-like policies and who wouldn't balk at stepping aside if or when Hoffa could return to the Teamsters presidency. He chose Frank E. Fitzsimmons, a long-time friend and ally. For a time, Gibbons considered running against Hoffa. Lacking needed support, he didn't. But, insiders say, he has been biding his time, hoping to move toward IBT's top job.

Showdown. After the death of English during a Teamsters board meeting last month, Gibbons bid for the secretary-treasurer job. One board member commented privately that Gibbons would be "a damn good secretary-treasurer, he's as good an administrator as you can hope to get." But, he added, "It's not a question of his doing the job, it's a question of his using it." An international secretary-treasurer can build a union political machine.

When the IBT board met in Washington to choose a successor to English, a number of names had been considered, but only two were important—Tom Flynn and Hal Gibbons. Fitzsimmons' choice was the trusted Flynn, whose ambitions were known to stop with the $75,000-a-year secretary-treasurer job and whose loyalty to Fitzsimmons and IBT structure and policies, were unquestioned.

What it means. Teamsters leaders still talk of Hoffa as "the boss" and "the old man" and predict that he will return to his presidency.

But for many of them, the predictions are strictly for the record. In the inner circles of the IBT, there is a growing feeling that the Justice Dept. won't allow Hoffa to resume the presidency. They say that "if the boss can, he'll be reelected by acclamation."

Otherwise, they expect Fitzsimmons to be elected to the job he now holds on an acting basis. He wants it. And, the feeling is, with Gibbons sidetracked, and Flynn in the No. 2 spot, bulwarking Fitzsimmons politically, there will be no contest.

Many lower-level teamsters officials hope Fitzsimmons will keep the job; Hoffa centralized power in the president's office, undermining second-echelon officialdom in their power bases, but Fitzsimmons returned to former Teamsters policies of decentralization and autonomy. End

Embezzlement Case Against Partin Fails to Surface; Critics Say He's Rewarded

Justice Agency Denies Bias

6/13/69

By NORMAN PEARLSTINE and HERBERT G. LAWSON
Staff Reporters of THE WALL STREET JOURNAL

BATON ROUGE, La.—~~Edward G. Partin~~ is no candidate for a good citizenship award. At various times during the last three decades, he has been jailed on a conviction of burglary, arrested on charges of robbery, larceny and rape, indicted (but not tried) on a charge of manslaughter and charged with kidnapping (later dismissed).

But Mr. Partin is a man to reckon with in the Baton Rouge area. As chieftain (his official title is Business Manager) of Local 5, International Brotherhood of Teamsters, he exerts great influence in construction and petrochemical projects and other endeavors in the region.

However, his most noteworthy connection is a past one, with the conviction of Teamster boss James R. Hoffa for jury-tampering in 1964. Mr. Partin was the Government's key witness. Released from jail in 1962 by the Department of Justice to work as an undercover agent, he provided damning testimony that Hoffa offered to "pay $15,000, $20,000—whatever it takes to get to the jury." The Teamsters boss still is in jail.

Mr. Partin faces continuing trouble himself, however. Outstanding charges against him include embezzlement. But no action has been forthcoming from the Federal officials chiefly responsible for pursuing such matters.

Everlasting Immunity?

Mr. Partin's critics, who are strongly disputed by the Justice Department, offer an explanation for his seeming good fortune over the last several years. They say that he became something of a hero to men who worked for the late Robert F. Kennedy, Attorney General at the time of the Hoffa case. These persons are said to fear that further prosecution of Mr. Partin might cause him to revise or recant his 1964 testimony, nullifying the Hoffa conviction.

The situation raises a troubling question: Has Mr. Partin been put above the law for his aid in convicting Hoffa? Gov. John McKeithen of Louisiana professes to think so. So do others in high academic, corporate and governmental positions in this state. Federal judges frown on promises of immunity given prospective witnesses by the Justice

Mr. Partin's critics, who are strongly disputed by the Justice Department, offer an explanation for his seeming good fortune over the last several years. They say that he became something of a hero to men who worked for the late Robert F. Kennedy, Attorney General at the time of the Hoffa case. These persons are said to fear that further prosecution of Mr. Partin might cause him to revise or recant his 1964 testimony, nullifying the Hoffa conviction.

The situation raises a troubling question: Has Mr. Partin been put above the law for his aid in convicting Hoffa? Gov. John McKeithen of Louisiana professes to think so. So do others in high academic, corporate and governmental positions in this state. Federal judges frown on promises of immunity given prospective witnesses by the Justice Department. When permitted, usually a promise involves immunity for criminal acts disclosed in the testimony. Occasionally, a past crime may be excused to get crucial testimony. But for a witness to get blanket immunity against future prosecution would be unprecedented.

The Justice Department vehemently denies that such is the case with Mr. Partin. "He's not being protected," says Henry Petersen, deputy assistant attorney general in the criminal division. On the other hand, Mr. Petersen says, "We don't want him subject to reprisal because of his (Hoffa) testimony." Mr. Petersen says there is clear evidence of attempts to persuade Mr. Partin to recant that testimony.

Seeing Conspiracies

Among those who spent a decade or more fighting Hoffa for the Justice Department, there is a tendency to see a Hoffa-inspired conspiracy behind every threat to Mr. Partin. Walter Sheridan, chief of the Justice team that investigated Hoffa and now an executive with the National Broadcasting Company, says: "It's natural for people to think I'm paranoic and see Hoffa behind every bush. But Hoffa is behind a lot of bushes."

Much of the controversy centers on a blue-ribbon Labor-Management Commission of Inquiry appointed by Gov. McKeithen, a Democrat, to look into labor strife that shut down $500 million of petrochemical plant construction in this industrial city in 1967. The commission's report, issued late last year, described a "reign of terror and lawlessness" and alleged numerous suspected violations of the Taft-Hartley Act, the Sherman Antitrust Act and other Federal laws. It singled out Mr. Partin and other members of Local 5 as the prime suspected offenders.

No Federal charges have resulted yet. Commission members, who have included the deans of Louisiana's two major law schools, charge intense Justice Department pressure hampered their investigation. And Gov. McKeithen makes this charge: "We have been harassed by people representing the Justice Department who we hoped were here to help us, but instead insisted we were tools of some sinister force to free Hoffa from the penitentiary."

The governor himself has been the center of storms in recent years. In 1967 it was disclosed that one of his key aides, Aubrey Young, had been conferring with a Mafia leader. Mr. Young resigned. Life magazine has accused the governor of tolerating widespread gambling and other organized criminal activity in the state.

Reports of a Letter

Mr. Partin denies any wrongdoing and says that the attacks on him indeed are a Hoffa-inspired conspiracy. But the talk of immunity persists, confronting John Mitchell, the current Attorney General, with a potentially explosive problem.

One persistent, though unconfirmed, report is that Mr. Partin has a letter signed by Robert Kennedy making certain commitments in return for his testimony. Public disclosure of such a letter—whose existence Mr. Partin denies—would be highly embarrassing. In any case, Mr. Partin could inject himself into the controversy over wire-tapping and other methods used in the Hoffa case that led Chief Justice Earl Warren to write a blistering dissent to the Supreme Court's affirmation of the Hoffa conviction.

Mitchell is said to have ordered a full review of Mr. Partin's treatment by the Justice Department in recent years. The outcome of that review isn't clear, but there are hints that Mr. Partin's luck may be running out.

The Justice Department's antitrust division has convened a New Orleans grand jury to look into possible labor-management collusion in the petrochemical plant labor strife. In mid-April, the grand jury was said to have been ready to issue an indictment or indictments, but it suddenly was recessed. The decision whether to push for indictments now rests with the antitrust division chief, Richard McLaren. Mr. McLaren and other sources in the antitrust division decline comment on the situation.

Another complication: The Commission of Inquiry here is under attack. Two members of Mr. Partin's union filed suits charging that the body was unconstitutional. Various lower courts upheld the commission. Earlier this week the Supreme Court declined to rule the body unconstitutional, but it sent one of the suits back to a Federal district court for further hearing on the Constitutional question. The decision left the commission open to new challenges.

Mr. Partin is 44. He says he has been shot twice and knifed once since 1961, but he still has a boxer's physique (he briefly was a professional fighter). He possesses an air of confidence and a persuasive manner. In answer to questions, he denies that he has supporters in the Justice Department. "I wish I had some pull up there," he says, sitting in a windowless office at the shabby Local 5 headquarters. "If I have a friend there, I don't know it."

There is evidence that Mr. Partin indeed has friends in Washington, and specifically in the Justice Department. One of them is Michael Epstein, an attorney considered the ranking "Hoffa expert" in the Justice Department.

Last year Mr. Epstein made a public admission of the Justice Department's commitment to Mr. Partin. He went before U.S. District Judge E. Gordon West here to ask dismissal of a 26-count charge of embezzlement and falsification of union records brought against Mr. Partin in 1962.

Assistance Rendered

Mr. Epstein told the judge that records in the case had disappeared and that one witness had died. He added: "Even if a successful prosecution could be maintained, the interests of justice warrant the dismissal. . . . We cannot be oblivious to assistance rendered the Government by those who provide and/or testify as to significant facts in important criminal cases."

The reference to the Hoffa case was clear. Judge West characterized the Government's request for dismissal as a "payoff" to Mr. Partin and asked if "the interests of justice are going to continue to be served by granting a lifetime immunity to someone who cooperates in some case that the then Attorney General might have particular interest in."

The judge declined to dismiss the charges.

Certainly the governor continued to be a subject of some controversy. A report now circulating in the state alleges that he received a campaign contribution of $10,000 from Louisiana Loan & Thrift Corp. through a conduit company.

A McKeithen Denial

The loan company collapsed. Its principal organizers recently were indicted on charges of Federal securities fraud. Jack P. F. Gremillion, Louisiana's attorney general, also was indicted, on charges of fraud and conspiracy for allegedly shielding the company from Federal scrutiny.

Federal sources confirm that such a contribution apparently was made to Gov. McKeithen's campaign. Says the governor: "I have never knowingly received anything from Louisiana Loan & Thrift—not as much as a shoeshine. If there was a contribution, I'm not aware of it, and my campaign committee tells me there was none."

Another key contact of Mr. Partin's is Mr. Sheridan, the former Justice Department aide who now works for NBC. Mr. Sheridan calls Mr. Partin "the only man in Louisiana who never lied to me." This friendship undoubtedly helps Mr. Partin maintain his aura of having powerful supporters.

Herbert J. Miller is another Washington friend. Under Robert Kennedy, he was chief of the Justice Department's criminal division. Now Mr. Miller heads a private law firm in Washington, and he is Mr. Partin's attorney. "I pay him when I can," says Mr. Partin, but Mr. Miller says he serves without fee. Mr. Miller says he represents the Local 5 leader because "he is a witness who testified for the Government at great personal risk."

Mr. Miller did Mr. Partin a favor before leaving the Justice Department in 1965. It appeared that lower-level officials might proceed with the embezzlement case against the Teamster leader. Mr. Miller personally intervened to block prosecution. "I made that decision," he acknowledges. Now Mr. Miller is using the contacts he still has at the Justice Department to argue that Mr. Partin shouldn't be indicted by the New Orleans grand jury. (Mr. Miller acknowledges that he hasn't read the commission report.)

Focus on Local 5

The labor troubles here, which started to get serious in 1966, were marked by a severe labor shortage, pirating of workers by various companies, a jurisdictional dispute between Local 5 and an electricians' union and, finally, a six-week shutdown of construction projects by most of the major petrochemical companies in 1967. The commission undertook to investigate reports of widespread extortion and other wrongdoing in the dealings of unions and various contractors.

Most of the 79 pages in the commission's report on the petrochemical shutdown and other labor disputes deal with Mr. Partin's union. The report concludes that there is "probable cause to believe that there have been violations of the Federal antiracketeering (Hobbs) Act,

The judge declined to dismiss the charges. The decision to prosecute is a Federal one. Mr. Partin hasn't been prosecuted. One source close to the Justice Department says flatly that the case never will be prosecuted.

In March of 1968, Mr. Epstein paid a visit to the New Orleans home of Cecil Morgan, former dean of the Tulane law school and the first chairman of the Commission of Inquiry. Mr. Morgan relates that the Justice Department attorney "in essence told me that there was a strong feeling within the Department of Justice that the commission was set up to go after and discredit Mr. Partin, thereby springing Hoffa."

Mr. Epstein then spoke of some commission investigators "playing a dual role of investigating for us and giving information to Hoffa," Mr. Morgan recalls. Mr. Morgan asked for proof. Mr. Epstein declined to offer any. The dean recalls saying, "I didn't care whether the chips fell on Mr. Partin, other labor leaders or on management. . . . I knew nothing of my investigators playing a dual role. And privately I didn't see what difference it made, so long as they were bringing the information to light."

An Angry Exit

Mr. Epstein wasn't pleased. He left, after telling Mr. Morgan, "You're being used by the Hoffa people as a tool." Mr. Morgan now says, "I couldn't help linking his statement to the fact that U.S. Attorney (Louis) LaCour had told us that neither he nor the FBI would be able to assist us in our investigations." Soon afterward Mr. Epstein confirmed that the Justice Department was investigating the commission for possible attempts to undermine the Hoffa conviction. A Federal grand jury in Nashville, to which Mr. Epstein is presenting evidence, still is looking into the matter but hasn't returned any indictments.

Mr. Epstein declines to discuss his conversation with Mr. Morgan. He says the talk was "confidential." But he emphatically says that "its absolutely not true" that the Justice Department is protecting Mr. Partin or allowing itself to be used by Mr. Partin. (Mr. Partin allegedly has been telling some of his critics that they can expect to be indicted by the Nashville grand jury.)

It is known that FBI agents were investigating the commission last June and July. On July 16, agents Troy H. Gist and Donald Hughes told commission staff members privately of Federal suspicions that the commission was a Hoffa tool. Commission members, meeting in official session nearby, invited the FBI men to air this charge publicly. The agents declined. Minutes of the meeting for that day show that Paul M. Hebert, dean of the Louisiana State University law school and then vice chairman of the commission, described the FBI assertions as "preposterous."

Gov. McKeithen, who set up the commission, says that Mr. Epstein last year "commenced an investigation to see if something possibly couldn't be uncovered on me."

The commission heard testmony like this:

—S. G. Broussard, a trucking contractor, said he was compelled to contribute to a defense fund set up by Local 5. The day after disclosing this to the commission, he was fired by his employer, Industrial Fills Materials, allegedly on Mr. Partin's instructions. The commission termed this "open and raw intimidation."

—What the commission called "an extortive pattern favoring AAA Contracting Co." in construction of the Louisiana National Bank building here. J. Ray Queen, a construction foreman, testified that he met frequently with Mr. Partin to discuss Teamster troubles on the job. Mr. Queen was asked this question: "Did he (Mr. Partin) make it clear to you that by using AAA that your job would then be expected to go better?" Mr. Queen replied, "That is correct."

—Clay Jones, warehouse superintendent at the Baton Rouge Uniroyal Inc. plant, testified that he was beaten up by Terry George, a Local 5 member, "because he did not comply with (Local 5's) desires concerning equipment rental" at a Uniroyal construction project. Mr. Jones is a 132-pounder. Mr. George, who weighs 265 pounds, was convicted of assault.

A Watched Man

Investigators for the commission complain that the Justice Department's closeness to Mr. Partin impeded their investigation. U.S. marshals still were protecting Mr. Partin against possible retaliation for his Hoffa testimony. "People knew about the Federal protection," says A. Harry Roberts, the commission's chief investigator. "And they thought the Justice Department was treating him like a football hero. They were afraid to talk because they thought he had been given lifetime immunity from prosecution."

Justice Department officials stress that Mr. Partin indeed did need protection after the Hoffa conviction. There is no indication of any attempt by the marshals to interfere with the commission's work. There reportedly still are threats to Mr. Partin and harassment by Hoffa supporters.

Mr. Petersen of the Justice Department's criminal division says that Carlos Marcello, identified as chief of the Mafia in Louisiana, has offered a bribe of $100,000 or more to Mr. Partin if he recants his Hoffa testimony.

Another attempt to get Mr. Partin to change his testimony involved Malcolm V. O'Hara, a criminal district judge in New Orleans. Judge O'Hara admitted in a 1967 Chicago court proceeding that he asked Mr. Partin to sign an affidavit prepared by a Teamsters International attorney. The affidavit would have modified Mr. Partin's testimony in the Hoffa trial.

Judge O'Hara said that he was asked to contact Mr. Partin by Zachary Strate, a New Orleans contractor who had been convicted in 1964 of conspiring to defraud a Teamster pension fund of $20 million. Strate had obtained a loan from the fund to finance a New Orleans motor hotel.

Mr. Partin says he has evidence that three investigators for the commission have bribed witnesses to give false statements about him and other Local 5 members. And he says he has furnished the Justice Department with tape recordings proving that some commission investigators were on Hoffa's payroll. The investigators deny the charges.

Mr. Petersen of the Justice Department declines comment, except to say that "even if commission investigators were motivated by a desire to spring Hoffa, that is immaterial," if the evidence against Mr. Partin or others proved to be substantial. Mr. Petersen agrees that no one has raised any questions about the integrity of the commission members.

Dear Bill:

A belated welcome to the region and also to the ranks of AFT Local 189.

The real reason for this letter is to offer such services of the Southern Regional Council which may be of use to you in your training program. I realize that your program is a national one but it could be that our interest in this region and its social and economic problems could be helpful in some of your activities.

My own program here at the Council works extensively with the labor movement throughout the region. Under separate cover I will send you a selection of publications which may prove of interest in discussions relating to the South, to racial relations and civil rights, and even to national social and economic issues.

I trust if you, or anyone else from your staff, is coming into Atlanta that they will take the time to be in touch with me and to stop by our offices.

Please feel free to call on me for assistance.

Sincerely,

Emory F. Via, Director
Labor Program

Population Shift to Change Political Map

IF IT'S TRUE that political candidates go where the voters are, then campaigns for public office will move more into the suburbs of major cities in future election contests.

The reason is that the population is rapidly moving from many major city areas into the suburbs.

Preliminary statistics emerging from the 1970 census show that the "outward" movement is evident at every level—not only outward to the fringe areas but outward to the West Coast.

Congressional experts calculate that on the basis of the most recent nose count by the U.S. Census Bureau, at least a dozen seats will almost certainly change in the House of Representatives as a result of census-based reapportionment.

Of the 12, five will go to California, three to Florida, and one each to Arizona, Colorado, Connecticut and Texas.

Because of smaller increases in population—or, in some instances, decreases in the number of residents — New York and Pennsylvania are likely to lose two seats each in the House of Representatives. Likely to each lose a seat are Alabama, Iowa, North Dakota, Ohio, Oklahoma, Tennessee, West Virginia and Wisconsin.

California—with a growth of nearly four million in population since 1960—has displaced New York as the most heavily-populated state in the union. California has nearly 19.7 million inhabitants, about a million more than New York.

Florida has gained more than 1.7 million people in the last 10 years, many of them retired citizens eligible to cast ballots after satisfying residency regulations.

Arizona has gained nearly one-half million people since 1960, bringing its total to more than 1.7 million.

Colorado and Connecticut each

The Int'l. Teamster have increased their populations by nearly half a million in the last decade. Texas has gained 1.4 million.

City Populations

City population alignments have gone greatly out of kilter since the last census also.

New York City has actually lost residents since 1960, while Los Angeles has grown more than 12 per cent.

Chicago, another political beehive, has lost nearly a quarter-million of its citizens in the last 10 years—down more than 6 per cent.

St. Louis, Detroit, Cleveland and Pittsburgh together have had a total of more than a half-million people move outward to the suburbs since 1960. Detroit's loss was 177,000.

Other cities that have lost major chunks of population include Milwaukee, San Francisco, Philadelphia and Boston.

Jacksonville, Fla., has been the fastest grower since 1960. A mecca for retired people and growing industry, Jacksonville has ballooned from 201,000 to 513,000—an increase of more than 155 per cent.

Other fast-growing communities that together have added more than 1.1 million in the last 10 years are Houston, Dallas, San Diego, Indianapolis, Memphis and Phoenix.

Reapportionment

A burst of activity in reapportionment will undoubtedly occur in state legislatures across the land in the next 24 months to meet the "one-man, one-vote" standard decreed by the U.S. Supreme Court decision of March 26, 1962. The court ruled that the judiciary has the authority to allot legislative seats fairly in state assemblies when lawmakers themselves fail to do the job.

In the past eight years, all but four of the various state legislative bodies have been reapportioned to meet the boundaries of the 1960 population count.

Realignment

Realignment following the latest census, of course, will hold top priority in all 50 states in the coming months. Because of this, the outcome of legislative elections this fall and in 1971 may be especially important not only to the major political parties but to special interest groups.

Elections for some 6,244 legislative seats will be held in 45 states this fall. (Five states choose their state lawmakers in odd-numbered years.) Included are 1,192 state senatorial seats and 5,052 house seats.

As a result of reapportionment of the past—and prospective reapportionment of the immediate future — the number of urban lawmakers at the statehouse level is dwindling and will continue to decline.

The latest census figures show that instead of the city dwellers emerging as the dominant force in the state lawmaking process, that it is the suburbanites that will be grabbing the political bull by the horns.

The effects of reapportionment in recent years have already shown a marked change in emphasis away from small-town problems to the concerns of the major metropolitan areas.

Just as rural legislators in some areas tried to resist reapportionment after the Baker v. Carr case in the Supreme Court nearly nine years ago, it is problematical that some city political chieftains will try to resist the shift to the suburbs.

But there is already plenty of precedent to overcome the diehards. Courts stepped in and carved out new districts in 13 states when legislatures refused to face up to their responsibility following the Supreme Court decision.

Politicians reluctant to submit to redistricting will have little real alternative. As in recent years, many a firmly-entrenched lawmaker will face the end of his political career as the boundary lines are redrawn.

Though insistent that legislatures must be equitably apportioned on a strict population basis the Supreme Court avoided handing down specific guidelines as to how much leeway might be permitted.

Generally, state tribunals have accepted arrangements in which the variant was as much as 10 per cent between the largest and smallest district.

This is a great mark of progress, however, when it is remembered that before the "one-man, one-vote" decision there were places like California where less than 11 per cent of the population controlled the state senate —and Nevada where only eight per cent of the population elected a majority of the state's senators.

Champions

The West Tampa Senior League All-Stars have clinched the world championship at Gary, Indiana, and a lot of the credit goes to Danny Bazarte. Danny, who knocked in three runs in the final game, was voted the most valuable player in the league. His father, Daniel Bazarte, works for Ryder Truck Lines and is a member of Teamster Local 79 in Tampa, Fla.

Teamster Seeks Governorship

Francis T. McGeever, a member of the Teamsters for 32 years and presently a member of Local 229, in Scranton, Pennsylvania, is a candidate for the Office of Governor of that state on the American Independent Party ticket. This is the same party George Wallace used as his power base when he sought the U.S. Presidency in 1968.

McGeever is married and has three children. He is a member of the Knights of Columbus and a member of the Holy Name Society of St. Mary's Church in Scranton.

Paint Firm

Employees of Blatz Paint Co., a paint manufacturer in Louisville, Ky., voted overwhelmingly for representation by Teamster Local 89 in a recent National Labor Relations Board election.

Marion Winstead, Local 89 secretary-treasurer, said 16 loaders, dumpers, mill operators and truck drivers were eligible to ballot. The vote count was 10 for the union and five against.

Subsidies Total $9.7 Billion During 1969

Subsidies granted by the United States government during 1969 totaled $9.77 billion according to the legislative reference service of Congress.

Of the nearly $10 billion, labor subsidies were estimated at $842 million—mostly for operation of the unemployment trust fund. The remainder of the subsidies went to big business and corporate farms with a trickle for home purchases.

Total subsidy figures for earlier years include: 1955—$3.7 billion; 1960—$5.7 billion; 1965—$6.6 billion.

Pension Fund Fuss

Critics Say UMW's Retirement Program Shortchanges Miners

Many Claims for Benefits Are Rejected; Investment Practices Are Questioned

$67 Million Checking Account

By JERRY LANDAUER
Staff Reporter of THE WALL STREET JOURNAL

MADISON, W.Va.—Duffy Raines was a lad of 13 when he left school before World War I to toil in the coal mines. Today he's a stoop-shouldered 68 and nearly blind. Yet he must still work, earning $75 a month plus free use of an old house trailer for standing by at a mine to answer the phone or call for help in case a miner gets hurt.

He continues to work for one reason: He can't prove enough years in a union-controlled job to qualify for a miner's $115 monthly pension. The United Mine Workers of America, which collected Mr. Raines' dues for 31 years, claims to have evidence that he worked too long as a company foreman to be eligible.

Mr. Raines insists: "I done never hired a man or fired a man in my life, and I wasn't never no foreman. I ain't been treated fair and square." But the UMW's retirement fund won't grant him a hearing to present testimony from as many as eight witnesses who say the "evidence" isn't true. President R. R. Humphreys of UMW District 17 in Charleston wrote him: "There is nothing we can do for you in this matter."

Here in Boone and neighboring West Virginia counties, a visitor can hear dozens of similar allegations of autocratic pension practices that appear to shortchange miners. Their discontent helps explain the frequent wildcat strikes and violence in the coal fields. Hundreds of miners who think they have been treated unfairly have joined the Association of Disabled Miners and Widows here in Madison, a group describing itself as "an organization of living dead men trying to help each other." Its attorney, P. W. Hendricks, says one key aim is to reform the pension fund, at least to the extent of requiring it to grant hearings in disputed cases.

Leaders Fare Better

As many once-loyal union members see it, certain UMW chiefs have forgotten what it's like to sweat in the mines, preferring instead to draw handsome salaries and pile up fat pensions.

Certainly, the retirement pay of UMW leaders appears far from comparable to that of working miners. The leaders' separate pension kitty, financed by miners' dues, now counts assets of $18 million, an ample sum to assure full benefits for the 400 union officeholders and their employes. District presidents, who earn between $20,000 and $30,000 a year, generally retire on half-pay, and the three top national union leaders can look forward to retirement at full salary—$50,000 annually in the case of UMW President W. A. (Tony) Boyle. Currently a miner's pension comes to just $1,380 a year.

Nor must union higher-ups contend with seemingly arbitrary decisions about qualifications for pension. If there's any doubt about years of service, a UMW leader can appeal to the union's own pension committee (Tony Boyle is the committee chairman) or even to the union's international executive board.

The miners' pensions and accompanying rights to medical care flow from a $100 million fund financed by employer payments of 40 cents for each ton of coal dug by union men; the pension benefits may rise and fall according to the amount of money in the fund. This retirement fund is the achievement of John L. Lewis, the UMW's 88-year-old former president who serves without pay as one of three trustees. The employer-appointed trustee is Henry G. Schmidt, chairman of North American Coal Corp. in Cleveland, who supplemented his $75,000 corporate salary last year by drawing $25,000 for his services to the pension fund.

Promoting UMW Objectives

In theory, the fund is entirely independent of the union, as the Taft-Hartley act requires. But because the fund's $30,000-a-year director and "neutral" trustee is 82-year-old Josephine Roche, a long-time Lewis associate ("She's his alter ego," a UMW spokesman says), the miners tend to overlook any legal distinction. To mischoolcd man like Duffy Raines, the union and the fund are identical, and a glance at the fund's investments suggests that it promotes some particular UMW objectives—sometimes at the expense of the miners.

For example, the fund is known to keep $67 million in checking accounts drawing no interest in the National Bank of Washington, a bank that the union happens to control; of one million outstanding shares, the UMW holds 736,944. This act of generosity to the union-controlled bank deprives the pension fund of more than $3 million a year in interest income.

In addition to the interest-free $67 million, the fund lets the union-controlled bank enjoy the use of $50 million more in interest-bearing time deposits. And for fees that in one recent year totaled $22,281, the bank also manages the separate $18 million retirement fund for UMW leaders and employes. But the far bigger pension fund for miners lacks such expert bank management, nor do the trustees consider it necessary to hire investment advisers.

A Slim Return

The results of this in-house management of the miners' pension fund haven't been particularly gratifying. Starting at least 10 years ago, the fund has accumulated a portfolio of common stocks for which it paid $44,189,000. As of last June 30, the portfolio was worth just $110,000 more than the fund paid, not enough even to keep pace with inflation.

In annual reports, the fund boasts about its "long-established policy of full public disclosure," yet outsiders can't determine why the investments haven't been more productive. The fund declines to detail its holdings. Director Roche doesn't grant interviews and Mr. Schmidt, the employer-appointed trustee, believes any comment should come from Miss Roche. "I'm not the chief executive officer so I have no comment," Mr. Schmidt says.

Some critics of the fund's operations suggest its shortcomings may reflect practices similar to those of the union itself. They say the union has often tended to invest not for maximum profit but rather to safeguard union jobs or to gain a voice in the management of coal companies with which the union negotiates wages, payments to the pension fund and other benefits.

In 1963, for example, the UMW sold—for $6,018,849—a big block of common stock in West Kentucky Coal Co., for which it had paid $13,072,946. An added $125,000 went down the drain on a sale of West Kentucky preferred stock. The UMW-controlled National Bank of Washington has lent millions of dollars to companies in coal or allied industries, taking care, however, to accept as collateral U.S. Treasury bonds provided by the union—rather than any security put up by the borrowers themselves; in one year, the union pledged bonds worth $5,230,000 to secure such loans. (UAW officials say that under the five years of the Boyle regime the union has not been nearly so ready to help management.)

But this union concern for management, officials contend, is more than matched by the fund's generosity toward beneficiaries—$96.7 million paid to nearly 70,000 pensioners last fiscal year, along with $50.2 million for hospital and medical care and $5.1 million for survivors' benefits. As for the fund's handling of pension applications, "I can't imagine any benefit plan bending over more backwards," a fund spokesman in Washington asserts.

Yet critics say serious inequities seem apparent. The fund has rejected many hundreds of pension claims besides that of Duffy Raines, and the grounds for a number of the rejections appear questionable to some observers.

Howard Linville is another disabled miner who has run afoul of "evidence in trust fund files" based on unspecified sources. For one thing, the pension fund claims he was born in April 1914 and thus hasn't reached 55, the minimum age to qualify for a pension. But ledgers on the Lincoln County courthouse record the birth of a Howard Linville in Bernie, W.Va., on April 4, 1911. Further, the fund claims that Mr. Linville didn't work in the coal industry during 1940. Yet a job classification sheet of the defunct Ridgeview Coal Co., dated May 16, 1955, lists a Howard Linville as having begun work as a machine helper on June 3, 1940.

A Demand From the Fund

Then there's Tommy Gibson, wheezing painfully from asthmatic bronchitis. He bought a group "hospital money plan" sponsored by the Veterans of Foreign Wars. "No restrictions on benefits," the plan promised, "because money is paid to you—not the doctor or hospital—to spend as you see fit." Later Tommy was hospitalized, and the UMW fund paid $708 toward the bill. From the insurance company, he collected $20 per day, or $480, all of which the fund wants; it says the money isn't indemnity for loss of pay, as Tommy thought, but represents the proceeds of insurance, "which must be applied toward the hospital and medical bills which have been paid by the fund."

Tommy Gibson refused to pay. The fund retaliated by grabbing his card entitling him to hospital benefits, and he fears he may have trouble when he applies for a pension. But he still vows: "I'll not be penalized because I had the foresight to buy insurance. Some other fellow, he can't buck them, but my wife works, and if worst comes to worst, I might be able to get into a VA hospital."

As for Duffy Raines, his pension eligibility would seem unquestionable, if it weren't for the contention that he served as a foreman. Basically, he must prove that he labored 20 years in the mines within the 30-year period immediately preceding his application for pension. Time spent on picket lines or looking for work or serving as a foreman doesn't count, even though the miner scrupulously kept paying his union dues.

Mr. Raines can easily show that he put in the required number of years, but he can't overcome the pension fund's mysterious "evidence" that he worked as a tipple foreman for Princess Dorothy Coal Co. from July 1932 to August 1953. To counter that contention, he asked UMW District President Humphreys in Charleston to question John J. Combs of nearby Sylvester. Back came this letter from Mr. Humphreys:

"We contacted Mr. John Combs and several other pensioners whose names you gave us and each stated that you were a foreman and they could not make a statement that you did not work as a foreman."

Curiously, Mr. Combs denies saying any such thing. "That's wrong!" he exclaims. "I never told nobody that Duffy was a foreman."

Support From Other Miners

Other ex-miners speak up for Duffy Raines. James E. Harris says, "At no time was Duffy classified as my boss." William McKnight declares, "I personally know that Mr. Raines was only a gang-pusher." Arthur Underwood says, "It was made plain that Duffy was only a leader of the men because he was the oldest man on the job."

G. T. Gibson of Whitesville, chief payroll clerk and office manager for Princess Dorothy from 1939 to 1953, supports the recollections of the union men that Mr. Raines didn't perform a foreman's duties. "Mr. Raines was carried on our payroll as a gang or tipple leader, with no authority to hire, fire or handle any grievances," Mr. Gibson remembers. And W. A. Miller of Pineville, who was the company's

I.Q.'s of Underprivileged Infants Raised Dramatically by Tutors

By JOHN LEO

A three-year study has indicated that tutoring of infants of underprivileged families can raise their I.Q.'s dramatically by the time they reach the age of 3.

The study, conducted by the National Institute for Mental Health in cooperation with Catholic University, tested 64 fifteen-month-old boys in a Negro section of Washington.

Half the group was tutored an hour each weekday, the other half was not. Twenty-one months later the tutored group scored an average intelligence quotient of 106, compared with 89 for the untutored group. An I.Q. of 100 is average.

Since the children were too young for any formal schooling, the tutoring, conducted by woman college graduates, consisted of play activities designed to stimulate mental and verbal capacity.

"I think the study shows that we need to reach down into infancy if we want children to reach their intellectual potential," Dr. Earl S. Schaefer, said recently. He is a psychologist with the national institute, and conceived the project.

He said the study indicated that the ultimate intellectual level of any social group could be established at the age of 21 months. "Until now the assumption has been that the level is set by 36 months, but that now seems too high."

The study identified what it called "the twin syndromes of maternal neglect and maternal hostile uninvolvement," and found a correlation between these and the child's hostile behavior and lack of intellectual development.

The tutors functioned more as part-time mothers, reading to the children, talking and playing with them, and taking them on walks or short trips.

In a follow-up study the researchers are discovering that when the tutoring stops the child's I.Q. begins to decline, although his language skills do not, Dr. Schaefer said.

"Dr. Betty Caldwell is finding the same thing in a similar study at Syracuse Medical School," he said. "It means that tutoring has to be continuous as well as early."

In the study, eight tutors saw an average of four children each weekday in the Cardozo area of Washington, roughly from 12th Street to 14th Street between T and V Streets.

The hypothesis of the study was that children between the ages of 15 and 36 months were especially receptive to verbal stimulation because it is the period of rapid language learning.

Using census data the researchers selected children who met two of three criteria: family income under $5,000, mother's education less than 12 years and mother's occupation, if any, either unskilled or semi-skilled.

After six months of tutoring, tests of learning and language skills showed that tutored group had an average I.Q. score of 96, and the untutored a score of 90. The tutored group earned increasingly higher scores at 27 and 36 months, while the untutored group continued with low scores.

Equality questioned

Second, said Mr. Simkin, the "myth about . . . the 'equal bargaining power' concept ought to be punctured." Power equality can't be adequately defined or measured, he noted, since the "will, strength, intelligence, and staying power" on both sides of the table depend on factors outside the domain of the bargaining that may change drastically and quickly. Unions are quoting this Simkin comment widely now, in view of widespread management demands for legislative changes to "equalize" bargaining powers.

Third, said Mr. Simkin, bargaining relationships, like a yo-yo, have long-term ups and downs; they aren't static—today's peace may mean slackened efforts and tomorrow's strife.

And fourth, bargaining isn't the same everywhere all the time. It is constantly changing—the "little contract books are getting fatter and fatter"—and vastly more complex. It varies from industry to industry and employer to employer. Differences "make it somewhat unrealistic to attempt to formulate any general rules about mandatory subjects for bargaining."

Generally, Mr. Simkin said, there's no "crisis" for collective bargaining now, if the word is to be broadly interpreted. There might be, however, in a single area.

Projest Equality Striving to Get Jobs for Members of Minorities

By PETER MILLONES

A religious group, planning a meeting at a hotel near New York City, telephoned the offices of Project Equality recently to ask for a check on whether the hotel gave equal employment opportunities to minority groups.

The project staff began its check, as part of an effort slowly taking form to channel the spending by religious groups here only to companies and unions that make a proven effort to employ Negroes and Puerto Ricans.

Project Equality, which is sponsored by 17 Protestant, Roman Catholic and Jewish groups here, was announced last July. It expects in the next few months to have virtually all of its initial paperwork completed.

The agency, whose modest offices are at 1501 Broadway, at 43d Street, is now supplying forms to the more than 4,000 units, such as schools and offices, affiliated with the original sponsors. The forms will be given to businesses with which these units deal.

The businesses are asked to pledge to provide equal employment opportunity and to allow Project Equality to investigate to make sure that the pledges are carried out. Many of the pledges are now being attached to checks paying bills.

Booklet Planned

Once the pledges are returned, or a business indicates it does not care to sign, the project will compile a booklet for the religious groups listing those businesses that agree to equal employment opportunity.

Although no one has an overall figure at this stage, millions of dollars in spending, including construction funds, could be affected.

Eugene P. Heller, the project director, said this week in an interview that "we are not merely playing a numbers game." He said the project was interested in minority employment at all job levels and not simply a fixed percentage of a payroll.

"We want to know what jobs minority members hold, and also how we can help to increase minority representation," Mr. Heller said.

He said that the sponsoring groups had selected coordinators to deal with his group and that they could, in turn pass on the project's findings to the various smaller units.

For example, the Roman Catholic Archdiocese of New York has 1,300 units, each which does some purchasing and each of which will be to be informed of the project's aims.

Board Head Named

The National Council of Churches and the American Jewish Committee are among the other sponsoring groups. The Right Rev. Richard H. Martin, Episcopal Suffragan Bishop of Long Island, has been elected president of the board of directors of the project.

Mr. Heller pointed out that ultimately the religious groups would expect construction contractors to use integrated work forces wherever possible. Although the project may not be dealing with unions directly, it hopes to encourage contractors to think more seriously about the employment of minority groups.

The project will concentrate at the outset on general manufacturing and services, insurance, banking and real estate and construction.

PENSION FUND

general "outside" foreman from 1936 to 1950, says Mr. Rains didn't clock miners' working time. "This was done by me," Mr. Miller swears in an affidavit.

Some other miners have lost out on pensions because they narrowly missed meeting certain eligibility requirements requirements that tend to shackle pension-seekers to mines organized by the United Mine Workers.

To be eligible for a pension under existing rules, a miner's last full year of employment must be in a union mine paying royalties to the pension fund. But last August the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia struck a blow against this regulation.

The court's ruling requires the trustees to prove why it was reasonable to deny pensions to two aged miners who quit the industry after working many years in union mines and then briefly for nonunion coal operators. One miner had put in 39 years altogether; he lost his pension because he worked the last two years in a nonunion mine.

United Mine Workers —

Both the Big Board and the Amex have studied and restudied the possibility of supplying back-office services for their members, but they only added to the confusion of an already messy situation. Brokers have never been clear just how much the Big Board and Amex would be able to do for them, and how much they would be left to do themselves. That made some brokers reluctant to invest in the big, expensive systems they need.

The new Midwest system will at least provide medium-sized brokerage houses with the chance to see how a very sophisticated system works out. And they need not belong to the Midwest Exchange to try it.

Old hand. The Chicago exchange is no newcomer at doing back-office chores. Its service subsidiary now processes data for 87 securities dealers, and Rubin claims that his clients account for nearly 20% of the total volume of all trades on all exchanges. But Midwest's current work is limited to back-office accounting, not the complex tasks of switching messages, matching orders, and on-line data-processing that Signet 80 will offer. If the system works as planned, it will be as fast and accurate as those that have been installed at such firms as Hornblower & Weeks-Hemphill, Noyes, which return a completed confirmation from the trading floor to a branch office in seconds.

Rubin and Tobin say that the Midwest operation will be nonprofit, but that they will try to make enough money to continue development and to expand the number of services. "The demise of the trading floor is possible," says Tobin, "and this system puts the Midwest Exchange in a good position to meet any changes that come."

Signet 80 has not been cheap to set up. Rubin says that programming for the computer communications system has alone cost more than $1-million. A small Culver City (Calif.) company, Computer Communications, Inc., did much of the design work and will supply terminal and control equipment. The basic computers are IBM/360s.

Initially, customers will be able to choose from about 17 "modules" that provide communications, order switching and matching, and accounting services. Prices have not yet been set, says Rubin, but the basic charge for a terminal will be from $650 to $750 a month. Eventually, Rubin hopes to add an automated document control system to help solve "cage" problems in handling stock and bond certificates.

With that service added, he believes, the Midwest system will be able to realize the ultimate in back-office systems—the so called "locked-in trade"—where all paperwork and accounting are completed and checked the instant buys and sells are made. ■

UNIONS

Coal walks out before it bargains

Spreading wildcat strikes in West Virginia coalfields this week provided a preview of what could happen this summer when the United Mine Workers presses demands for "fat" wages and benefits in the bituminous industry. The union will ask for wage increases of at least 35% over three years. Basic steel and oil companies that own major mines will be strongly involved on management's side. This could harden the negotiations and bring a serious threat of strikes.

More than 50,000 miners walked out this week in West Virginia and other Appalachian coal states in what the union called a "spontaneous" strike to protest a court-ordered ouster of UMW President W. A. "Tony" Boyle as trustee of the UMW Welfare & Retirement Fund. The court ruled that the fund had been mismanaged because over a 21-year period, millions of dollars in reserves were kept in an interest-free account in the UMW-controlled National Bank of Washington. The court called this a breach of trust and ordered the union and bank to pay damages, to be set at a hearing next week. Boyle retorts that the interest-free deposits started far back in the John L. Lewis era. But there is more behind the wildcat strikes than support for Boyle on this issue. Mine owners, who went to court against the "illegal" stoppage, called it "a general strike," involving union politics and the bargaining ahead.

UPI

The UMW's Boyle: Government action and a split in his ranks imperil his power.

Union split. With contract bargaining ahead, the Boyle faction in the sharply divided UMW is pointing to the pro-Boyle demonstrations to indicate that the union is militantly behind him. An anti-Boyle bloc claims a majority of working miners, raising questions of the ability of the UMW leadership to negotiate a contract and get it ratified.

Led by Boyle, the UMW in 1968 settled with coal operators for raises totaling $7 a day over three years, which increased the miners minimum daily pay to $37. Boyle has pledged to boost daily pay to $50 in this year's negotiations, and the UMW's National Scale & Policy Committee recently set that as its wage demand.

> Contracts covering 90,000 miners can be terminated after Sept. 30 on 60 days' notice

The union also plans to go after an 80¢-a-ton royalty on all coal mined under UMW contracts, double the present 40¢ a ton. Its aims here are to shore up the Welfare & Retirement Fund and to make it possible to increase pensions and insurance welfare benefits.

Contracts covering 90,000 soft coal miners can be terminated after Sept. 30 on 60-day notice and the UMW is expected to serve this notice in early August. The negotiations will be crucial for Boyle. Unless he produces a settlement that is eminently satisfactory to the miners, he could be the target of open rebellion in the rank and file. Yet this year, a big settlement may be harder to win than ever before.

Operators' position. The Bituminous Coal Operators Assn., which bargains for the soft coal industry, has strengthened its negotiating team by two strategic moves. It has named R. Heath Larry, vice-chairman of United States Steel Corp. and basic steel's top negotiator with the United Steelworkers, to the new post of chairman of the BCOA.

In addition, it has called in Joseph Moody as the association's president and day-to-day negotiator with the UMW. Moody built a reputation as a shrewd, tough negotiator for Southern coal mine operators in the 1960s. He succeeds George Judy, who has been widely criticized in the BCOA for the 1968 settlement with the Mine Workers, which many operators called "excessively expensive."

Larry and Moody are expected to take a hard position against the $50-a-day wage demand and against doubling the tonnage royalty. Their presence also could mean the end of the tradition set by John L. Lewis of private bargaining by a top negotiator for the industry and his UMW counterpart. ■

To what extent are the attitudes of non-managerial white-collar employees and management toward unions at a government-operated facility, like TVA, different from the attitudes of similar employees and management in private enterprise? Perhaps the crux of the difference lies in the posture of TVA toward collective bargaining.

White-Collar Employees and the Unions at TVA

ARTHUR THOMPSON

Professor of Management

Blacksburg, Virginia

It is no secret that white-collar employees have been less than eager to acquire union membership cards. This lack of eagerness has been characteristic of employees in most white-collar occupations and in both private and public employment. For example, federal employees, even though granted the formal right to form, join, and participate in unions (Executive Order 10988, January, 1962), have not yet swelled the membership rolls of government employee unions, despite informal predictions that such unions might well become "one of the best growth stocks in organized labor."[1]

Explanations for this general lack of white-collar enthusiasm usually center around the ideas that white-collar employees feel unions are beneath their dignity; they closely identify with management; they are afraid unions will hurt their opportunities for advancement; they are more satisfied than blue-collar workers with their jobs and their status; and they view union tactics (strikes, picketing, etc.) as crude and exploitative.

In striking contrast to this disinterest or hostility generally evinced by white-collar employees, a case study of white-collar employees at the Tennessee Valley Authority reveals strong and widespread support for unions and the concept of collective bargaining. The TVA study also furnishes empirical evidence that the degree of employee interest in unions varies significantly among employees according to age, length of service and education, although the key variable seems to be management's posture toward collective bargaining.

Collective Bargaining at TVA

The Tennessee Valley Authority is one of the few federal government agencies which maintains a collective bargaining relationship with white-collar employee organizations. Ever since its creation in 1933, TVA has staunchly subscribed to the principle of "democratic management."[2] TVA has implemented this principle by standing ready to bargain collectively in good faith with the representatives of the employees. Through their unions, employees are given the opportunity to participate in decisions relating to personnel policies and procedures. TVA management then attempts to execute its function in matters affecting employees with the concurrence and positive cooperation of the unions.

[2]For a more detailed discussion of TVA's philosophy of management, see Harry L. Case, "Cornerstones of Personnel Administration in TVA," Personnel Administration, Volume XI, No. 3 (January, 1949) pp. 10-12; or Harry L. Case, Personnel Policy in a Public Agency: The TVA Experience, (New York: Harper and Brothers, 1955).

As a corollary to its belief in "democratic management," both blue-collar and white-collar employees have been encouraged by TVA management to join and support employee organizations. An illustration of this encouragement is found in the Agreement between TVA and the employee organizations representing the white-collar TVA employees.

> "Membership on the part of employees in an employee union . . . and participation in the activities of the organization are recognized as improving relations between management and employees and promoting employee efficiency and understanding of TVA policy, thereby contributing to the accomplishment to TVA objectives. Therefore, such membership and such participation are among the positive factors of merit and efficiency to be considered in selecting employees for promotion, transfer, and retention."[3]

Consequently, both blue-collar and white-collar groups have formed employee organizations and negotiated written agreements with TVA.[4] These agreements between TVA and the employee organizations constitute one of the most outstanding and successful examples of collective bargaining in public employment.[5] The principle of exclusive majority representation is firmly recognized; procedures are established for the settlement of employee grievances with binding arbitration as the final step: and annual conferences and negotiations are designated as the means of determining rates of pay, hours of work, and other conditions of employment. In addition, TVA management and the employee organizations support a systematic program of "union-management cooperation," whereby joint efforts are made to increase efficiency, productivity, and teamwork.[6] With the exception of union security, the subject matter of collective bargaining at TVA is, perhaps, as broad as that which normally prevails in private industry. Such matters as classification of position, work schedules, salary schedules, promotion, tenure, filling of vacancies, demotion, transfer, suspension, reduction in employment, grievances, fringe benefits, and employee training are bargainable issues at TVA.

Methodology

Questionnaires were sent to a random sample of 1300 salaried, non-managerial, white-collar employees in TVA installations throughout the Tennessee Valley in order to ascertain their attitudes toward union representation and some of the factors underlying those attitudes. All of these employees are represented by employee organizations.[7] The types of white-collar positions covered by the survey included accountants, administrative personnel, clerks, secretaries, custodial and maintenance personnel, building guards, engineers, chemists, technicians, and inspectors.

[3]Salary Policy Employee Panel and the Tennessee Valley Authority, Articles of Agreement and Supplementary Agreements, negotiated December 5, 1950, renewed and reaffirmed May 7, 1964, p. 35.

[4]"Blue-collar-employee organizations have had a formal agreement with TVA since 1940. A formal agreement covering "white-collar" employees was signed in 1950.

[5]For an analysis of the collective bargaining relationship between TVA and its white-collar employees, see Arthur A. Thompson, "Collective Bargaining in the Public Service—The TVA Experience and Its Implications for Other Government Agencies," Labor Law Journal, Vol. 17, No. 2 (February, 1966) pp. 89-98.

[6]For an up-to-date survey of the "union-management cooperation" program at TVA, see John E. Massey, "Labor-Management Cooperation in TVA," Public Personnel Review, (July, 1965). pp. 130-4.

1. TVA Engineer's Association.
2. TVA Association of Professional Chemists and Chemical Engineers.
3. Public Safety Service Employees Union, AFL-CIO.
4. Office Employees International Union, AFL-CIO.
5. Building Service Employees International Union, AFL-CIO.

While precise figures are not available, it is reliably estimated that 80-90% of the eligible employees are union members.

The questionnaire contained six items relating to the employees' attitudes toward employee organizations in general, and four items concerning the performance and effectiveness of the specific organizations which represent these employees. Each item had five possible responses. The category of responses to each item was constructed in the form of a continuum with one end of the continuum being "favorable" and the opposite end being "unfavorable." The "favorable" end of the continuum indicated attitudes or opinions judged to be most favorable to the union.

Mean scores for each of the ten items were calculated to determine the consensus among the respondents, and to provide a basis for comparing the responses to the ten items.[8] The mean scores were computed in such a manner that the higher the mean score the more "favorable" was the attitude toward, or evaluation of, the employee organizations.[9]

In order to examine the influence of the selected biographical variable, the respondents were classified according to age, length of service, sex, and educational attainment. Mean scores for each age group, sex, education level, and length of service classification were computed, as before, to serve as an index or measure of each group's attitude or evaluation with respect to each item. These mean scores were then tested for statistically significant differences.

Findings

Approximately 70 per cent, or 911 of the original sample of 1300, responded to the questionnaire survey. The 911 respondents constituted nearly 17 per cent of the salaried, non-managerial employees at TVA.

Attitudes of White-Collar TVA Employees Toward Employee Organizations

The responses of the 911 white-collar employees to the 10 attitude statements indicated strong support for employee organizations and collective bargaining at TVA, as indicated in Table 1.

For example, the response to item 5 which received the highest mean score among the 10 items, showed that more than 80 per cent of the respondents believed that employee representatives should be consulted before TVA management changed policies or procedures that directly affected employees. The response to item 7 revealed that less than 6 per cent believed TVA would be a better place to work if there were no employee organizations. The mean scores and percentage distributions for items 1, 6, and 10 further confirm, to only a slightly lesser degree, the findings of generally strong support for unions among white-collar employees. The responses to items 2, 4, and 8 reflected favorable employee opinions regarding the performance and contribution of the specific employee organizations at TVA.

On only two items were there even minor indications of somewhat unfavorable attitudes regarding employee support of unions and collective bargaining. The response to item 3 showed that barely one-fourth of the respondents believed that membership in an employee organization at TVA increased a person's professional status. Such a finding is not surprising and is a much discussed problem among those attempting to organize white-collar workers. Many white-collar employees are said to have a strong belief that union membership is, in fact, quite "unprofessional" and TVA employees are, apparently, no exception.

The second item which evoked a relatively less favorable response concerned the performance of the employee organizations. Slightly more than 10 per cent rated the quality of union representation as "poor", and 27.6 per cent gave their representatives a "fair" rating.

[8]The mean scores were computed according to the method of successive categories. For a detailed description of the method of successive categories, see J. P. Guilford, Psychometric Methods (New York: McGraw-Hill Book Company, Inc. 1954), pp. 237-41.

[9]The mean scores in ascending order were —1.69, —0.73, 0.00, 0.98, and 2.31. The mean scores were assigned so that the lowest score was given to the most "unfavorable" response and the highest score given to the most "favorable" response.

However, these responses do not indicate disinterest in unions as much as they suggest dissatisfaction with the functioning of the unions involved. Even so, more than 60 per cent gave their union representatives a better than "fair" rating.

Age and White-Collar TVA Employee Attitudes Toward Unions

Although the data indicated generally favorable attitudes toward employee organizations among all respondents, the mean scores of the five age groups displayed a consistent tendency to rise as age increased, thereby indicating more favorable union attitudes among older employees (Table 2). On all ten items there were statistically significant differences among the mean scores of the five age groups. For eight of the ten items the mean scores of the respondents in both the 50-59 and the 60+ age brackets were significantly higher than the mean scores of at least one of the three younger age groups. Not only did the respondents' attitudes toward unions in general become more favorable as age increased (items 1, 3, 5, 6, 7, 10), but approval of the unions' performance and effectiveness also grew stronger with age (items 2, 4, 8, 9). These results thus clearly suggest that the older white-collar employees at TVA are more intense supporters of unions and collective bargaining than are the younger ones.

Length of Service and White-Collar TVA Employee Attitudes Toward Unions

As might be anticipated, the response pattern of the groups arranged according to length of service (Table 3) was similar to the pattern exhibited by the various age groups. Again, statistically significant differences in the mean scores were found for all ten items. In all instances, the mean scores exhibited a tendency to increase with length of service, although this tendency was not as strong as in the case of increasing age. Thus the data indicate that at TVA the attitudes of white-collar employees towards unions and union performance tend to grow more favorable as length of service increases.

Since length of service and age are closely correlated, it is not surprising to find that age and length of service have similar influences upon employee attitudes toward unions.[10] However, the typical union emphasis on seniority privileges should tend to promote favorable attitudes toward unions among employees with greater years of service, irrespective of the age factor.

Sex and White-Collar TVA Employee Attitudes Toward Unions

Tests revealed no significant differences between the responses of men and women on any of the ten items (Table 4). Although the female respondents indicated slightly more favorable responses on five items and the male respondents on the other five items, none of the differences in mean scores were statistically significant. Thus the data reveal no real differences in the attitudes of male and female white-collar employees toward employee organizations.

Education and White-Collar TVA Employee Attitudes Toward Unions

The mean scores of the respondents grouped according to education (as shown in Table 5) indicate that interest in, or support of, unions varies inversely with the level of education. Those employees with less education tended to look upon unions more favorably than did employees with more years of formal education. The tendency to view unions less positively was most evident among college graduates and among those employees who had done work beyond the B.S. degree.

[10]It is quite difficult to statistically isolate the separate effects of such characteristics as age and length of service due to the high variation within individuals. Although the behavior of various groups can often be reliably predicted, it is much more difficult to predict individual behavior because of the vast number and complexity of the variables involved.

Why the Strong Support for Unions at TVA?

The strong approval of unions and collective bargaining evidenced by TVA white-collar employees—a group which includes a sizable percentage of professional employees—presents a noteworthy contrast to the widespread resistance of other white-collar workers to labor organizations. It is obvious that at TVA the typical objections of white-collar employees to unions have been overcome. In the absence of evidence to suggest that these white-collar employees are inherently different from white-collar employees of other organizations, it is revealing to consider TVA management's rather unique philosophy regarding the role of unions.

TVA has consistently displayed an affirmative willingness to bargain with employee organizations over the terms and conditions of employment. Unions are viewed as essentially constructive forces rather than as necessary evils, and the determination of personnel policies and procedures is unhesitatingly shared with employees through their union representatives. Instead of the typical battle for employee loyalty, there exists a firm, unambiguous belief that cooperation between unions and management can enhance the achievement of TVA's objectives. TVA even encourages union activity to the extent of declaring that union membership and participation are "among the positive factors of merit and efficiency to be considered in selecting employees for promotion, transfer, and retention."

Within such an environment, professional development, close identification with management, and increased opportunities for promotion are all perfectly consistent with employee participation in union activities. And since strikes against federal agencies are prohibited, there is little likelihood that union membership will involve the overt exercises of force so distasteful to many white-collar workers. Thus, it is not surprising to find employees supporting an organization (union) which clearly has the power to exercise control over the work environment in a manner that is favorable to them.

Nevertheless, certain personal attributes, particularly age and education, seem to influence significantly the degree of employee support of unions. At TVA the older, more senior employees are typically stronger supporters of unions than are the younger, less experienced employees. And the educational attainments of the white-collar TVA employees seem inversely related to acceptance of employee organizations. If these findings are also characteristic of other white-collar government employees, they spell trouble for organizers of government employees, given the rising educational level among white-collar employees and the declining average age of labor force participants resulting from the influx of young workers and earlier retirement.

Transferability of the TVA Experience

Without question, the TVA experience with white-collar unions is characterized by somewhat unique circumstances. Still, the findings are instructive on the following points:

First, it seems fair to conclude that the environment for collective bargaining created by managerial attitudes has a much greater impact than the influence of employee attributes, particularly since the attitudes toward unions and union performance were relatively favorable even among the younger, less experienced, and more educated employees.

Second, white-collar resistance to unionism appears to diminish significantly in an environment where participation in unions is consistent with the achievement of white-collar employee objectives. The propensity to join and participate in unions probably increases as employees become aware of the union's ability to control the work environment in ways which are favorable to them.

Third, managerial attitudes toward employee organizations may prove to be the most important factor influencing the success of collective bargaining in the public service. There can be little doubt that the attitudes of white-collar TVA employees toward unions and the obvious success of collective bargaining have mainly been the product of TVA management's affirmative willingness to share its decision-making powers with unions in matters affecting the employees.

managers and union negotiations: "They are never satisfied."

What can be done to tap more of man's inherent storehouse of emergent motives? Here again, practical advice is hard to come by. Trying to make operating a ten-key adding machine a job which operates in the service of social self-esteem and self-actualization motives is the intellectual analog to "pounding sand down a rat hole." Short of entirely revamping organizational philosophies and physical facilities (an alternative which is clearly financially prohibitive, even if it were intellectually possible) apparently not much can be done. Furthermore, the problem is likely to become exacerbated as more people get more education and their aspiration levels continue to rise as a consequence. (There is some evidence, for example, from a study we're now completing that this is one reason why bright students may shy away from business careers.)

Summary

People need organizations and organizations need people. This is a fact of our social system. Yet we find that the mutual facilitation of the satisfaction of these needs has been hindered by incomplete or simplified notions of human motivation on the one hand, and organizational inertia on the other. This is a problem with a long history and as the future unfolds we can expect it to become ever more pressing. The "bargain" whereby an individual will sacrifice personal growth on the job for physical and psychological security will become less and less of a bargain as people become more educated and more strongly motivated toward fulfilling their potentialities. It is not likely that human nature will change; the question is, will organizations?

THE TROUBLED AMERICAN

A Special Report on the White Majority

All through the skittish 1960s, America has been almost obsessed with its alienated minorities—the incendiary black militant and the welfare mother, the hedonistic hippie and the campus revolutionary. But now the pendulum of public attention is in the midst of one of those great swings that profoundly change the way the nation thinks about itself. Suddenly, the focus is on the citizen who outnumbers, outvotes and could, if he chose to, outgun the fringe rebel. After years of feeling himself a besieged minority, the man in the middle—representing America's vast white middle-class majority—is giving vent to his frustration, his disillusionment—and his anger.

"You better watch out," barks Eric Hoffer, San Francisco's bare-knuckle philosopher. "The common man is standing up and someday he's going to elect a policeman President of the United States."

How fed up is the little guy, the average white citizen who has been dubbed "the Middle American"? Is the country sliding inexorably toward an apocalyptic spasm—perhaps racial or class warfare or a turn to a grass-roots dictator who would promise to restore domestic tranquillity by suppressing all dissent and unrest? To get a definitive reading on the mood of the American majority, NEWSWEEK commissioned The Gallup Organization to survey the white population with special attention to the middle-income group—the blue- and white-collar families who make up three-fifths of U.S. whites.

The survey, bolstered by reports from NEWSWEEK correspondents around the country, suggests that the average American is more deeply troubled about his country's future than at any time since the Great Depression. The surface concerns are easy to catalogue: a futile war abroad and a malignant racial atmosphere at home, unnerving inflation and scarifying crime rates, the implacable hostility of much of the young. But the Middle American malaise cuts much deeper—right to those fundamental questions of the sanctity of work and the stability of the family, of whether a rewarding middle-class life is still possible in modern America.

America has always been the most middle-class of nations, the most generous and the most optimistic. But the pressures of the times have produced confused and contradictory impulses among the people Richard Nixon likes to call "the forgotten Americans." Himself a prototypical expression of the middle-class majority ("These are my people," he says. "We speak the same language"), the President presides over a nation nervously edging rightward in a desperate try to catch its balance after years of upheaval.

The reassertion of traditional values has festooned millions of automobile windows with American-flag decals, generated nationwide crusades to restore prayers to the schoolroom, to ban sex education, to curb pornography. The uneasy new mood has also spawned a coast-to-coast surge to law-and-order politicians—one of them a roly-poly Malaprop named Mario Procaccino, who may oust America's most outspokenly progressive mayor, John V. Lindsay, in New York City, once the Athens of American liberalism.

'You better watch out—the common man is standing up'

For the Negro, the turn in the tide can have the most momentous consequences. More and more American institutions are opening their doors to Negroes—mostly as a result of the social momentum generated in the Kennedy-Johnson years. Still, with the Nixon Administration setting the tone, the country seems to be retreating from active concern with its black minority—as the nation did nearly a century ago with the demise of Reconstruction. Self-reliant or self-delusive, the trend to separatism among younger blacks only intensifies the withdrawal. More ominous, even well-educated liberal whites have begun once more to speak openly of genetic differences between the races, an intellectual vogue before the turn of the century. "One has to consider the evidence that the Negro may be inherently inferior to the white and incapable of competing with him," says an MIT professor. "Look at the ones who have succeeded—they're almost all light-colored."

Such talk is only the tip of the iceberg. All around the country—especially among blue-collar workers—whites feel increasingly free to voice their prejudices and their hostility. "Everybody wants a gun," reports a community worker in a Slavic neighborhood in Milwaukee. "They think they've heard from black power, wait till they hear from white power—the little slob, GI Joe, the guy who breaks his ass and makes this country go. Boy, he's getting sick and tired of all this mess. One day he'll get fed up and when he does, look out!" A sign of the times: near-violent demonstrations by white construction workers en-

Metal Workers Union: A Race Breakthrough

11/13/65 - TRIBUNE

By Sue Reinert
Of The Herald Tribune Staff

Nine Negroes and two Puerto Ricans scored high enough in an aptitude test to be admitted to a 30-man apprentice class of Local 28 of the Sheet Metal Workers, it was announced yesterday.

The achievement was described by civil rihgts leader Bayard Rustin as "perhaps the most tremendous breakthrough" so far in the effort to get minority group youths into building trades unions. And Dr. Kenneth Clark, the Negro psychologist who criticized the Local 28 test last spring when it resulted in the admission of only one Negro, has this comment: "Hooray!"

Mr. Rustin said the event was an announcement to building trades unions that "minority group members are prepared" to be admitted, and it would also give "heart and inspiration" to Negro youths who previously had little hope of passing such tests.

As for the union, Thomas Mulhearn, secretary-treasury, said: "As long as the boys made it according to the rules, more power to them."

Local 28 has agreed to begin a 30-man apprentice class shortly after Nov. 15, when it must name the members of the class. However, the union may be ordered by the Appellate Division of State Supreme Court to enlarge its class to 65 members. Fourteen Negroes and Puerto Ricans scored among the top 65 marks on the test, which was given Oct. 24.

The successful applicants came to a press conference yeterday after being interviwed by officials of the union. In deciding whom to admit, the union must grade each applicant, with a weight of 500 points given for the four-hour written test, and 150 points for the interview.

The press conference, held at the offices of the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters, 217 W. 125th St., was sponsored by the Workers Defense League, which administered a three-week tutoring program for minority-group applicants.

NONE LAST TIME

Last spring, the league attempted a similar tutoring plan, although it was more hastily planned. The result: no Negro applicant scored in the top 65. However, because some white youths dropped out, one Negro, Scott Green, an Air Force veteran, was admitted to the 65-man apprenticeship class. Previously there had been no Negro members for at least 30 years.

The est was given as the result of a historic court ruling in 1964, striking down

ELEVEN PASS APTITUDE TEST

Local 28's father-son admission policy as discriminatory and ordering "objective" tests for apprentices. The examination tested aaptitude in learning, in mechanical rea-e soning, in visualising three-dimensional objects, and in mathematics. It was compiled and administered by the New York University Testing and Advisement Center.

Dr. Clark's criticism was that such an examination did not test for qualities required in sheet metal work, and, furthermore, was the type of test that disadvantaged Negroes scored worst on.

Mr. Rustin said yesterday that while the league still agreed with Dr. Clark's assessment, "this achievement shows that if they can get help and proper tutoring, Negroes and Puerto Ricans can compete with the majority of society.'

Mr. Rustin also noted that the Negro and Puerto Rican applicants knew they would be "rewarded with real work" if they succeeded. In this situation, "the impossible can be accomplished," he said.

Actually, the minority group applicants did much better than the white applicants in proportion to their number. The league sent 25 applicants, of whom 14 placed among the top 65, or a successful percentage of more than half. There were 135 white applicants, of whom 51 placed among the top 65, or 38 per cent of the white applicants.

The scores of the 14 Negroes and Puerto Ricans ranged from 440, out of a perfect 500, to 262. The top scorer was Bennie Newton, 20, a graduate of Haaren High School. Mr. Newton said he had studied electronic technology at New York City Community College for a while, but had to drop out because of finances. After 6 months in the Army, he worked as a stock clerk.

4-YEAR PROGRAM

One applicant, Herbert Young, 21, said he would have t otake an initial cut in salary to become an apprentice. He has been working at United Parcel for $3.25 an hour. Sheet metal apprentices start at $2.10 an hour. After the four-year apprenticeship program, journeymen make more than $6 a hour.

Asked why he was willing to take the cut, Mr. Young said with surprise: "Why, I've always planned to be a sheet metal worker. I went to school for that."

Twelve of the 14 successfully Negroes and Puerto Ricans were graduated from New York City high schools. Of the twelve, seven had academic diplomas, two general, and three vocational. All three vocational school graduates went to Aviation Trades High School.

All but two of the 14 attended the tutoring sessions run by Dennis Derryck, 25, a high school math teacher who is writing his doctoral thesis in educational administration at Fordham University. Mr. Derryck, an easy-going but persistent instructor, praised his students for "working so hard." In turn, most of them thought he was the best teacher in their educational careers.

Ray Murphy, director of the WDL apprenticeship program, said the league was thinking of training applicants for the painters union, and already had 18 applicants who are waiting for a test to be administered by Local 2 of the plumbers.

The league has also filed a $151,000 proposal with the city's Anti-Poverty Board to extend its turtoring program and to initiate research.

UNION ACCEPTING NEGROES FOR JOBS

Construction Breakthrough Provided by New Course

NYT - 11/13/65

N.Y Times
11/13/65

By NATALIE JAFFE

The door to membership in the city's construction unions was opened a little wider yesterday for Negroes and Puerto Ricans.

The Workers Defense League announced that 14 young Negro and Puerto Rican men were among 65 applicants who passed an apprenticeship test given last month by Local 28 of the Sheet Metal Workers International Association. Of the 330 young men who took the union's first test last spring, not one of the 30 Negro applicants passed.

For the second test, the league organized an intensive, four-week tutoring program. Fourteen of the 25 students passed, 11 of them scoring among the top 23 applicants.

The first test was given last spring after the State Commission on Human Rights and the State Supreme Court ordered the union to abandon its father-son admission practice which, the court said, "automatically excluded" Negroes.

Although no nonwhite men scored high enough then to qualify for one of the 65 openings in the apprenticeship program, the withdrawal of three white applicants left room for the admission of 21-year-old Scott Green. He became the first Negro among the 78-year-old union's 3,300 members.

Further Advances Seen

In announcing the results of last month's test yesterday in the room where the boys studied four nights a week for a month, Bayard Rustin, founder of the league's apprenticeship program, said:

"This is the most tremendous breakthrough in the craft trades we have had. It will lead the way for other unions, it will give heart and inspiration to other boys, and it proves conclusively that if these young men get the help they need, they can meet the requirements of the majority, society."

The sheet metal workers union and the plumbers union have been two of the major targets of civil rights groups who have been battling alleged discriminatory admission practices in the unions since 1962. Ernest Green, assistant director of the league's apprenticeship program, said the next target would be the plumbers' union.

"Since the state ruled against discriminatory practices in unions two years ago," he said, "the plumbers have not taken on any apprentices. We have 16 applications with them now, and as soon as they form a new class, we're ready to go."

Although the program's directors were jubilant yesterday, the future is not yet secure even in the sheet metal workers union. Union officials have yet to judge the results of physical exams and a personal interview given yesterday to the high-scoring applicants.

More important, the original court order for examinations did not require that they be conducted regularly. Mrs. Shirley A. Siegel, an assistant attorney general in charge of the state Civil Rights Bureau, suggested that further court action might be required.

The question of further exams, and the number of apprentices to be admitted, she said, is now before the Appellate Division. The union has agreed to accept 30 apprentices, which would include 11 from the Workers Defense League program, until the court decides whether or not the original order, stipulating 65, shall be followed.

Just how eager the young men are to enter the apprenticeship program at $2.10 an hour, was indicated yesterday by 21-year-old Herbert Young who will be giving up a $3.25 an hour job with United Parcel if he is accepted by the union.

"Money's not everything," he said yesterday in the auditorium of the International Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters at 217 West 125th Street. "There's always the future."

Fix leaking faucets. Officials say one leaking faucet can waste 15,000 to 100,000 gallons in a year.

Georgia Council Conducts Class for Macon Workers

MACON, Ga.—The RWDSU Georgia Council has concluded a shop stewards training class for memmers of Locals 315 and 339 in Macon.

Twenty-six members of the locals attended the course, which was given in six two-hour sessions.

The course began in mid-September and continued until the middle of December.

Int'l Rep. Guy Dickinson, president of the Georgia Council, was the instructor.

Workers who attended are employed at the Maxwell, Eagle and Ralston Purina shops in Macon.

Council Action Launches New Labor Studies Center

PLANS TO ESTABLISH a new AFL-CIO Labor Studies Center are outlined to the federation's Executive Council by Education Dir. Walter Davis. The center is scheduled to begin operations next Labor Day, with tuition-free intensive courses for union leaders and staff.

Pioneer Program To Train Leaders

By Saul Miller

Bal Harbour, Fla.—A new, pioneering AFL-CIO Labor Studies Center has been created by the federation's Executive Council to develop trade union leadership through varied educational training programs.

The center is planned to go into operation in Washington, D.C., by Labor Day 1969, initially drawing its student body from full-time union officials and expanding later to offer courses for local union officers and ultimately rank-and-file members.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told a press conference that the council will set up a specific financing plan later at the sessions here and that he foresaw no problems in this regard. A report to the council, he said, estimated that the first-year cost would be about $350,000 rising to $600,000 in the third year. There would be about 400 students in the first year of operations increasing to about 900 in three years.

The training and education would be provided tuition free, but the unions sending students to the center would provide for their living costs.

Meany said that the feasibility study of the center, conducted under the guidance of the federation's Committee on Education and the Dept. of Education, showed a tremendous need and interest in the center. The need is growing daily, he stressed, for better educated trade union officials to handle the complex problems of the modern industrial system.

The center will be incorporated as a non-profit education institution governed by a Board of Trustees composed of 16 members—10 from the AFL-CIO and six from the public.

While a number of federation affiliates have set up their own training programs, the AFL-CIO-created-and-financed center marks the first time in the history of the American trade union movement that a national labor education center has been established.

The council statement said that it has been "long convinced of the need and desirability of such an educational institution and is now agreed that the AFL-CIO can and should establish one without further delay."

The adoption of the statement establishing the center came after the council heard a detailed report by members of the committee that conducted the feasibility study authorized by the council in September 1967.

The presentation was made by Walter Davis, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education, Prof. Fred Hoehler, director of labor studies programs at Michigan State University and former education that groups of militants had invaded classrooms, taken them over and removed the assigned teachers.

director of the Steelworkers, and Otto Pragan, assistant director of the federation's Dept. of Education.

Setting a target opening date for Labor Day 1969, the council said the center would be established temporarily in Washington, D.C., with a permanent resident facility to be selected there at a later date.

The center's objectives will be to develop trade union leadership through training programs in the various technical skills required of a union leader and through education programs in the social sciences and humanities "in order that technical skills be buttressed by a firm grounding in theory and philosophy."

In addition, the center will develop and engage in education programs "which will carry the labor movement's basic philosophy to all parts of the community and through its inter-union nature help involve its students in the total labor movement and thus strengthen all affiliated organizations."

A basic staff of full-time professionals for teaching and administrative duties will be recruited and will be supplemented with the part-time services of experts from other institutions.

The initial curriculum will include courses on the American system of unionism, labor economics, American society and civilization, effective reading and other subjects to meet the needs of the labor movement.

The center will establish special institutes to assist the various headquarters departments of the AFL-CIO and its affiliates; establish a special course of study to prepare union members for government service; "and ultimately, if appropriate, establish long-term courses and seminars in the social sciences and humanities."

Meany Cites Need to Build Free Unions

American labor aids in building free unions around the globe because it knows that "slave labor threatens free labor everywhere," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told graduates of the 28th training program of the American Institute for Free Labor Development.

Also addressing the graduation ceremonies was Robert B. Black, director of social development for the Agency for International Development.

Graduates of the latest AIFLD class—36 union leaders from Brazil and Caribbean nations—bring to nearly 800 the number from Latin America who have completed the course at Front Royal, Va. They, in turn, become instructors in their own countries.

Meany stressed that the course is designed to help those who take it understand U.S. unions, benefit from their experiences, adopt them where possible, but "not necessarily emulate us."

The important thing, Meany said, is that the graduates help build "free labor structures" that will advance the wages and working standards of union members, and thereby strengthen the economies of their countries.

Black said the U.S. government sees the labor movement in Latin America as "perhaps the best system of private organizations who assemble, speak their views and represent their interests in the open societies of their countries."

Labor unions, he added, are "one of the fundamental building blocks in the creation of an effective modern society, along with cooperatives, credit unions, community organizations, and women's and student's groups."

He urged the graduates to equip themselves with the economic facts about their countries and make their voices heard in helping to determine economic policies.

SAVANNAH LOCAL CHARTERED

AFT re-emerging in South

ATLANTA

After an almost total absence of 14 years, the teacher-union movement is beginning to re-emerge in the South. Since January, two new AFT locals have been chartered in Georgia, two more have been organized in Tennessee, a Florida local has won recognition equal to that of its NEA rival, and there is a growing union drive for bargaining rights in New Orleans.

While one-quarter of the Federation's membership once was in the South, most of that was lost in 1956, when the national convention voted to expel locals unwilling to desegregate. A few scattered, integrated locals remained; for example, New Orleans and Mobile, both of which became major forces in the struggle of the 1960s.

The new locals in Tennessee, Georgia, and Florida, plus the Mobile and New Orleans locals, now include more than 5,000 teachers, and, according to AFT Director of Field Services George Brickhouse, the drive is just beginning. Interest in AFT organization is being shown in several Virginia and North Carolina communities, Brickhouse said, and several more locals will have been chartered in the South by the end of 1970.

300 IN SAVANNAH

The most recent local to affiliate is in Savannah, Ga. AFT President David Selden met with 300 teachers May 25 and presented the integrated group with a new charter.

"You are going to organize the teachers of this town so they can have the dignity they dreamed of when they started college," Selden said. Discussing collective bargaining and the use of the strike "as a last resort," Selden said, "Only beggars, slaves, and fools would work under conditions that they haven't negotiated."

Selden told a press conference prior to the charter ceremony that the "response by Savannah teachers to the AFT program really looks good. Teachers' concerns don't seem to be centered around one thing, such as a salary increase this year, but teachers are more concerned with long-range issues."

Elected president at the charter-presentation meeting was Janette Caroll. Freddy West was named vice-president, Joan Morgan was elected secretary, and Dorothy Crawford was chosen treasurer. A constitution and program committee has been organized under Edward Williams.

Rayburn Stevens, president of the Atlanta local, chartered earlier this year, reports that new members are joining daily, and that teachers in cities throughout the state are seeking information about the union. AFT national representatives who have been working in the state are Howard Hursey and David Mann.

NEW LOCAL IN FAYETTE

Meanwhile, a new local has been organized in Fayette County, Tenn., and, with the organization of teachers in Memphis earlier this year, and the old local in Chattanooga, plans are being made to organize a state federation.

MIAMI RECOGNITION

In Miami, the Dade County School board last month accorded official recognition to the Dade Federation of Teachers as an employee organization for the purpose of collective bargaining, giving it the same rights as NEA affiliates to use school mail, school facilities for meetings, and dues checkoff.

NEW ORLEANS COALITION

Eugene Didier, president of AFT Local 527 in New Orleans, announced the formation of a "Coalition of Teachers Organizations" to press for implementation of a $1,600 raise, voted by the state legislature two years ago but never implemented. Didier said the coalition, in which Local 527 and the Orleans Education Association are involved, was not a "merger," but merely a joint effort to pressure authorities. Local 527 is pressing a drive to win collective-bargaining rights for New Orleans teachers.

Local, state unions act on Indochina war

vention of the Michigan Federation of Teachers approved an antiwar resolution which "scored and totally condemned" President Nixon's decision to send U.S. combat troops into Cambodia, MFT President Henry Linne reported. Convention delegates substituted stronger language for the prepared resolution; instead of "opposition to this policy of increasing intervention," the convention "totally condemned President Nixon's aggressive act" and took a position of "unequivocal opposition not only to the invasion of Cambodia, but also the continued presence of U.S. military personnel in Southeast Asia." The MFT resolution also condemned the "blind partisan support given to President Nixon's illegal action by Michigan's Republican Senator Robert Griffin and Republican Senatorial candidate Lenore Romney."

The 315 delegates to the MFT convention represented about 20 percent of the public-school teachers in Michigan, Linne stated.

MINNESOTA CONVENTION STAND

Another antiwar resolution was passed by delegates to the annual convention of the Minnesota Federation of Teachers which met in Duluth April 17 and 18, prior to the sending of U.S. troops to Cambodia. Richard Bennett, "MFT Action" editor, reported that "a spirited debate was raised by the introduction of a Vietnamese resolution demanding 'an end to this senseless and wasteful war by the immediate withdrawal of all American troops.'" The resolution passed by a vote of 75-58.

ASKS MEETING WITH NIXON

The United Federation of College Teachers, Local 1460, wrote President Nixon on behalf of "thousands of college and university faculty in the New York City area," calling on him "to reverse the trend toward escalation of the war in Indochina."

The UFCT also asked Nixon to meet with representatives of the local union. "We further call upon you to listen to our nation's youth," the message added, "who seek to express their dissent with your past actions and your unwarranted blanket characterizations which contributed to the atmosphere of violence which resulted in the tragic deaths at Kent State University at the hands of the National Guard. We are dedicated to peaceful, nonviolent action," the UFCT letter went on, "but your actions and words have served to alienate youth and serve to cast doubt on the democratic process which sets the U.S. off from totalitarian nations."

OTHER REACTIONS

These other reactions to the Cambodian events were reported to the American Teacher:

- Raoul Teilhet, president of the California Federation of Teachers, James Ballard, president of the San Francisco Federation of Teachers, Local 61, and presidents of nine other AFT locals, were among 451 trade unionists who signed a full-page ad in the San Francisco Chronicle on May 18 declaring to President Nixon that "American working people and their families are deeply disturbed at your expansion of the war into Cambodia." The ad said, "We want a cease-fire now; we want out of Cambodia now; we want out of Vietnam now!" Other AFT local presidents who signed included Jeff Bauer, Local 2052; Walter Freeman, Local 1474; Conn Hallinan, Local 1570; Erwin Kelly, Local 1352; Ray Lorenzato, Local 1493; David Mage, Local 1362; Allan Neddick, Local 1671; St. John Smith, Local 866; and Leah Schuman, Local 1928.
- In San Pablo, Calif., the Contra Costa College Federation of Teachers wired AFL-CIO President Meany criticizing his endorsement of the move into Cambodia, calling it "a betrayal of the American labor-union movement to commit its 13 million members" to the "unconstitutional, immoral, economically unsound, and potentially disastrous" Cambodian action. Lewis said that the local would "withhold" per-capita payments to AFL-CIO bodies in protest. (In Washington, D.C., however, AFT officials noted that under the AFT national constitution, local affiliates must pay such per-capitas; the constitution was so amended at the 1968 convention.)
- A resolution adopted at a membership meeting of the Washington (D.C.) Teachers Union condemned the Cambodian action and called for immediate withdrawal of all U.S. troops, as well as instructing delegates to the AFT national convention to press for a change in AFT's no-position policy to one of opposition to the war.
- The St. Paul (Minn.) Federation of Teachers' executive board wired AFL-CIO President Meany and the AFL-CIO Executive Council: "We disagree with your statement that the 13 million members of the AFL-CIO support President Nixon's action in sending American troops into Cambodia. Because members of Local 28 are divided on this issue, we feel you should not have made such a blanket statement on the President's action."
- At the University of Florida, teachers and students called for a schoolwide strike. Kenneth Megill, president of the AFT local there, said, "The strike is called to protest the invasion of Cambodia, the massacre at Kent State, the resumption of bombing of North Vietnam and the University of Florida's complicity in the war effort."

in the district's decision-making processes.

"In this regard, we find it particularly significant that the board of education was forced to spend nearly 12 hours last Sunday struggling with some 26 top administrators who were complaining that the contract would reduce their heretofore virtually unlimited powers over teachers.

"A second real gain of the contract is that it recognizes the right of an organization, in this case UTLA, to represent and defend its members without the possibility of harassment or intimidation by the management of the school district.

"Educationally, this means that teachers will be free to fight for better programs for children without fear that tradition-bound administrators will penalize them for daring to disagree.

"A third major gain of the contract is that the board has recognized a series of priorities for educational improvement recommended by teachers. These include smaller classes, better maintenance, better reading programs, and all the other needs that we have been discussing.

"We return to our classrooms tomorrow with greater honor and dignity than teachers have ever possessed in this city."

An informal, at-random poll of 10 teachers leaving the Shrine Auditorium the day before the vote had shown four enthusiastic over the contract, four ready to stay out longer; and three who said, in effect, "It's not all we wanted, but it's a start."

One teacher seemed to sum up the prevailing reaction: "For a nonunion town, in a state beset by anti-education politicians who keep money from the schools, it's a good settlement. It's something to build on the next time around."

UTLA is now turning its attention to the June 2 election, in which voters will decide the fate of Proposition Eight, a proposal to restore state financing to the level of 50 percent of the school budget. That support has slumped to 36 percent in Los Angeles, placing most of the burden on local citizens.—D.E.

INTERIM REPORT on SURVEY OF SOUTHERN TRADE UNIONS AND THE RACE PROBLEM

Based on Confidential Report of Emanuel Muravchik
To Executive Board, Jewish Labor Committee National Trade Union Council
Atlantic City, N. J., May 10, 1957

The AFL-CIO Civil Rights Department has given us permission to make this off-the-record report on a survey of the impact of current racial developments on Southern union locals. This survey was made to provide the AFL-CIO and its affiliates, committees and staff with information which might help to implement in the South AFL-CIO policy on civil rights. We hope that it will further understanding of the problems and provide a basis on which program decisions can be made.

The survey was conducted by the Jewish Labor Committee. Cooperation was received from many sources -- primarily, of course, from the regional, state and local leadership of the labor movement. Two voluntary organizations, the Southern Regional Council and the Catholic Committee of the South, also gave valuable assistance. Most of the costs of the survey were covered by a grant to the Jewish Labor Committee from the Fund for the Republic.

Comprehensive questionnaires were prepared to explore all facets of the racial situation in Southern union locals. The South was divided for survey purposes into 12 areas. In each, a Southern trade unionist concerned about the race problem and in most cases familiar with locals in the area was assigned to collect the information and fill in the questionnaires, one for each local. First priority was given to locals where the race issue was known to have arisen, and second priority to leading and so-called "typical" locals in that area.

The present report is drawn from completed surveys for the states of Alabama, Florida, Georgia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Mississippi and Tennessee, and partial reports from Texas and Louisiana. Virginia is still to be surveyed. This report is based on the detailed information we obtained on 110 union locals, in 32 different internationals. TWUA, UAW, IAM, Chemical Workers and USA are the only internationals represented by five or more locals. Ten locals are in the building trades.

Here, then, is a summary of what we found.

Segregated Factories, Integrated Union Locals

There are almost no integrated factories in the South, but lots of integrated union locals. What does this mean? How did it come about?

In most Southern factories, all production jobs are held by white workers; Negroes are employed only as sweepers, janitors and other maintenance men. In those few factories where Negroes are employed in production work, they are usually segregated, and rarely hold jobs comparable to those of the white workers. When Negroes are hired at all as production workers, it is usually in the unskilled, semi-skilled or "helper" category, and "seniority" always means seniority within the racial group. This is so despite the fact that almost one-third of the Southern union contracts we examined in the survey contain a non-discrimination clause -- we even found three with clauses outlawing segregation!

The typical union local accepts the racial pattern established by the employer, but includes all employees in one local. Thus, if a factory has 800 white production workers and 25 Negro maintenance men, these 825 workers all belong to the same union local. That is why more than two-thirds of the Southern locals examined in the survey include both white and Negro members.

Most one-race locals cover trades or factories in which only that race is employed. Only one-seventh of the locals in our survey represent the separate organization of the races in trades or plants where both races are employed.

Negroes in Southern Locals

But the fact that Negroes are found in two-thirds of all Southern union locals does not in itself give a clear picture of the proportion of Negroes in the Southern labor movement. In two-fifths of these bi-racial locals, Negroes make up less than ten per cent of the membership--although they constitute about a third of the population in the areas surveyed.

Within the framework of the South's unequal racial pattern, whites and Negroes in a union local will usually work together. If there has not been a tense racial situation in the community, and if there is not a segregationist spokesman in the local, race relations in the union will not only be tranquil, they will be cooperative.

Four-fifths of the bi-racial locals surveyed reported Negro attendance at union meetings, roughly in proportion to their number in the membership. In only one local where more than a tenth of the members are Negroes was it reported that no Negroes attend meetings. Less than one-tenth of the bi-racial locals hold segregated meetings.

In over a quarter of the bi-racial locals, there is at least one Negro officer; in over half of them, at least one Negro steward. This pattern prevails equally whether less or more than ten per cent of the members are Negroes.

Inequality in the Unions

But while the general pattern is one of acceptance of Negroes, there are many bi-racial locals in which the Negro members do not in fact participate. Even in the best situations, segregation prevails in the social functions. And there are only a few locals which have made any real effort to extend the range of job opportunities open to their Negro members.

There are a number of cases in our survey group of Negro locals which in fact are deprived of participation in contract negotiations through being represented by the white local's business agent, or by negotiating through a joint council on whose executive body they have no representation. It is important to remember that there are some cases in which the union itself was at one time a weapon for the exclusion of Negroes from the trade.

There is no geographical or uniform craft pattern of Negro participation or exclusion. It is possible to find equalitarian locals in what would seem to be the most unfavorable regions or situations, and equally possible to find white-supremacist policies in locals which in other ways seem quite progressive.

Dynamics of the Current Racial Situation

The labor movement in the South today is a minority movement with about the same standing in the community that it had in the North in 1932. Current developments must be viewed against a recognition that labor is not a powerful force in most Southern communities. The racial issue has become intense in the Southern labor movement because of the forthright position taken by AFL-CIO leadership on school integration. But for that, the labor movement in the South would not be stirred at its grass roots by the present situation any more deeply than are other groups in the Southern community. However, because the Executive Council took a forthright position and George Meany enunciated it so clearly, and it was widely reported in the Southern press, rumblings of dissent, disaffection and disaffiliation were heard.

White Members' Attitudes

Let us see what our survey shows about the attitudes of Southern white union members. In two-thirds of the locals surveyed, it was reported that "most" white members are opposed to school integration. "Most" was the strongest category in the questionnaire. There was not one local at the other end of the scale: "few" white members opposed.

In over a third of the locals, "some" members are in favor of the White Citizens' Councils. And "many" or "most" of the white members in over one-third of the locals are reported to have strong feelings against the labor movement, because of its stand in opposing segregation.

However, strong loyalty to the local on the part of "many" or "most" members was reported in all cases: "most" in 60%. Respondents did not feel that, in a conflict between a White Citizens' Council and the local, any of these locals would be deserted by "most" of its members; though in one out of every nine locals, it was felt that "many" members would find the WCC a stronger pull.

Conflicting Loyalties

Now let's see what has actually happened in Southern union locals as a result of these conflicting loyalties -- to organized labor and to segregation.

Almost all labor leaders interviewed answered "Yes" to the question: "Does the race issue affect the Southern labor movement more now than before the Supreme Court decision?" Many reported strained relations between white and Negro workers, even to the point of breaking off all conversation and contact.

Trouble Spots

Open trouble was reported in about fifty locals. Compared to the 110 surveyed, this figure seems large. But let us remember that "trouble spots" were given first priority in this survey -- these fifty "trouble" locals, therefore, include most of the locals in our survey areas in which strife has arisen in the last few years. This is not a big proportion of the estimated 2,000 locals in these areas.

From the information we have gathered, however, it would seem that the attitudes found in these "trouble spots" are not unusual, but are common to most Southern locals. What, then, are the special characteristics of these "trouble" locals? Why in these locals did racism overcome the counterforces of inertia and union loyalty?

There seems to be no common pattern by region or union: One cannot say that trouble was concentrated in the deep-South states, or that it arose in supposedly conservative unions rather than in those considered more progressive. Nor did it arise more frequently in locals with a large Negro membership -- or a small Negro membership -- or no Negro membership. In many cases, "hot" racial issues have arisen in "lily-white" locals; and, on the other hand, the most serious conflict arose in the local and plant where probably greatest progress has been made towards integration and equality of the Southern Negro in mass production.

But there are some clues as to why trouble has developed in some cases and not in others:

In half the locals which have had a race issue, local union officials raised it. In almost half, some members belong to the White Citizens' Councils. Race was a factional issue in only six cases; in only five cases was there an organized racist faction within the local. Thus we might conclude that when the race issue comes to the surface in a Southern union local, it has usually been stimulated by active racist groups with members in the local, and/or backed by at least some of the local's leadership.

What issues are being raised by the segregationists? First, AFL-CIO policy on school integration: this was reported in three-fourths of all "trouble" locals. Next, union contributions to the NAACP: this was raised in three-fifths of these locals. Economic competition of Negroes was also brought up in two-fifths of these locals, but only where Negroes form the majority of the membership or where significant new economic opportunities are being opened to Negroes.

The race issue was brought to the floor at union meetings in less than half these cases. This almost always took the form of proposed resolutions against the policy of the AFL-CIO. Disaffiliation was proposed in only a few instances, and in every such case reported to us, leadership for this move came from individuals leading or active in White Citizens' Councils. As you know, none of these efforts resulted in disaffiliation.*

*The two American Federation of Teachers' locals which have disaffiliated were not covered in this survey, and these cases involved an additional factor: an ultimatum from their international to integrate or be expelled.

Organizing Drives

We also have some information on organizing drives -- but unfortunately not enough to draw statistical conclusions. It does indicate, however, that the race issue looms larger among organizing problems than it did before the Supreme Court decision. The general feeling seems to be that union organizing, in the South, is coming up against a stone wall. To what extent that wall has been built by the national labor movement's stand on school integration, and to what extent it is part of the general anti-labor atmosphere in the South, with its "right-to-work" laws, buttressed by reaction to the current racket investigations, is difficult to judge.

Attitudes of Union Leaders

Local union leaders were asked what they felt the national leadership could do to help them. Most said they wish it would soft-pedal its position. Some would like to see the labor movement withdraw entirely from the civil rights arena; others would be content if top labor leadership would avoid making frequent public declarations on the subject.

Top Southern labor leaders almost unanimously voice acceptance of the national AFL-CIO's stand on integration. In extensive interviews I had with them in the course of setting up this survey, most expressed a sense of real responsibility for encouraging the movement in this direction. Only one defended segregation. Some clearly believe in integration on principle; others may not, but accept it as part of their responsibility as officers of the labor movement. Almost all espouse gradualism, however -- though very few have specific suggestions on what the national organization can do to help the Southern labor movement meet the present situation.

Dealing with the Race Issue in the Labor Movement

Both the survey and the interviews indicate that the main means of dealing with conflicts on the race question, when they arise in the union local, is to sidetrack them, rule them out of order, insist that this is not labor's business. We learned of no other short-term method of handling this situation. The only claims of straight, frank handling of the race question came from two predominantly Negro locals in relatively favorable locations.

It is clear that the issue -- if we are to preserve the unity of the labor movement and to progress at the same time -- must be handled on a long-range basis. We must apply to the situation our best knowledge and methods and all the experience which has been accumulated in other areas. We must utilize as staff only the ablest and most tactful representatives -- and they must be acceptable to white Southerners, for it is clear that it will not be easy to make progress on the racial front while preserving the unity of the labor movement. We can only have both a growing labor movement and progress toward integration through devoting time and resources and the highest quality of work to this effort.

Dear Manny:

Many thanks for the interim report on the survey of unions in the South. It is a very interesting and readable summary of the situation, and I am glad that the AFL-CIO has given you permission to make it available to interested groups and individuals.

We are glad to feel that we were able to help in making the survey possible.

With best regards,

Sincerely,

LOCAL UNION QUESTIONNAIRE

1. Local name, number and international. (If necessary, in order to obtain information, just list by name of international, then local A, B, C, etc.)

City _____ State _____

2. Number of members_____. Chartered: before 1932_____ 1933-41_____
1942-50_____ after 1950_____

3. If you are interviewing a leader or leaders of this local to obtain the information for your questionnaire, ask them the following questions and record the replies on a separate sheet: "Do you feel that the race issue affects the labor movement in the South today more than it did before the Supreme Court decision? In meeting criticism from union members, what arguments do you find most useful? What could the national offices of the unions do to help you meet these situations and issues?"

4. Has the race issue played any role in the local within the last two years? Yes____. No____. If yes, answer questions #5 through #12. If no, go on to question #13.

5. Relate on a separate sheet the story of whatever has happened in this local around the race issue in the last two years. (You will find that some of the information you relate here will also be called for in questions #6 - #12.)

6. If pro-segregation views are being expressed in the local, what points do they emphasize? Opposition to AFL-CIO policy on school integration____. Economic competition from Negroes____. Opposition to purported financial support by unions of the NAACP____. If others, list.

7. Who is raising the race issue in the local? An individual member or a few individuals____. Many members____. An organized group____. Are they from one department____, one geographical background____, one faction in the local___? Are they leadership people____, union officers____?

8. Where have they raised it? At local meetings____. Executive board meetings____. In the plant____. Please indicate on separate sheet exactly what happened when it was raised.

9. Have there been any proposals or moves to "do something" against the position of the labor movement? Yes____. No____. If yes, what was proposed? To send letters or resolutions to higher bodies____. Disaffiliate or seek other affiliation____. Endorse the idea of a Southern Federation of Labor____. Adopt public statements opposite to labor's position____. List others. Describe on a separate sheet what happened when these proposals were made.

10. Has any "outside" source tried to stir up this issue in the local? Yes___. No____. If yes, what source? Employer____. Local press____. White Citizens Council____. List others_____

11. Is there a White Citizens Council-type group which has membership or following among members of the local? Yes____. No____. If yes, name it on a separate sheet, indicating its strength among union members, how the leadership and membership line up on this organization, what it has attempted to do in the local, and related developments.

12. Has the race issue affected attendance at union meetings, payment of dues, revocation of union membership under the right-to-work laws, allegiance of Negro and white members, etc. Yes____. No____. If yes, indicate which.

13. Has the local ever taken stands in behalf of Negro rights outside the shop or participated in community efforts in this direction? This would include such things as being a participant in a political grouping with the Negro community in elections, backing the Southern Regional Council, adopting resolutions on minority questions, etc. Yes____. No____. If yes, give the details on a separate page.

14. Are there white members in the local? Yes____. No____. If yes, answer questions #15 and #16. If no, skip over to question #17.

15. Indicate how many of the white members hold these attitudes:

Most___, many____, few____ have antagonistic feelings toward Negroes.
Most___, many____, few____ are strongly opposed to school integration.
Most___, many____, few____ would go along with putting public schools under private control.
Most___, many____, few____ are in favor of the White Citizens Councils.
Most___, many____, few____ are opposed to Negroes voting.
Most___, many____, few____ are opposed to Negroes having the same economic opportunities on the job as white workers have.
Most___, many____, few____ are in favor of segregation in general.

16. How do the white members feel on these union matters:

Most___, many____, few____ have strong loyalty to their local.
Most___, many____, few____ " " " " " international.
Most___, many____, few____ " " " " the AFL-CIO.
Most___, many____, few____ have a strong feeling against the labor movement for its opposition to segregation.
Most___, many____, few____ would leave the union rather than repudiate the White Citizens Councils.
Most___, many____, few____ would leave the union if the union took in Negro members (where there are none now).
Most___, many____, few____ oppose the local's protecting equal rights of the Negroes (where there now are Negro members).

17. Are there Negro workers in the local? Yes____. No____. If yes, answer questions #18 and #19. (It might be well to consult with the Negro leadership before replying.) If no, skip to question #20.

Local Union Questionnaire

18. How do the Negro members feel on these union matters:

Most___, many____, few____ have strong loyalty to their local.
Most___, many____, few____ " " " " " international.
Most___, many____, few____ " " " " the AFL-CIO.
Most___, many____, few____ are dissatisfied with what the local has done on Negro questions.
Most___, many____, few____ are dissatisfied with what the international has done on Negro rights.
Most___, many____, few____ will actively fight the White Citizens Council's racist views and groups in the union local.

19. Which race issues in the shop or union local do the Negroes seem to be most concerned about?

20. Is this an integrated local of white and Negro members together? Yes___. No___. If yes, answer questions #21 through #27. If no, go on to question #28.

21. Number of white members_____. Male_____. Female_____.
Number of Negro members_____. Male_____. Female_____.

22. What is the average attendance at local meetings?_____.
What is the average white attendance?_____. Negro attendance?_____.
Have the proportions changed in the last two years? Yes___. No___.
Comment on any changes of attendance by either race in the last two years.

23. Are the local meetings segregated? Yes____. No____. Are other activities or local functions segregated? Yes____. No____. If yes, describe.

24. Has there been any pressure to break up the local into a white and a Negro local? Yes___. No___. If yes, give details on separate sheet and indicate if it has been aggravated by current developments. Has there been pressure to introduce segregation within the local in areas in which it did not previously prevail? Yes___. No___. Has there been pressure to desegregate activities within the local which were previously segregated? Yes___. No___. If either is yes, indicate which kind of pressure and describe the developments.

25. Do Negroes participate in local union activities other than attendance at meetings? Yes___. If so, indicate which. Is this new?
No ___. If not, indicate why.

26. Are there Negro officers in the local? Yes___. No___. If yes, indicate what positions they hold and how many are on the local executive board out of a total of how many, and how this has changed during the last two years. Are there Negro shop stewards? Yes___. No___. What is the relation between white and Negro officers, white and Negro shop stewards? Any changes in the last two years?

27. What are the relations between white and Negro rand-and-file membership? Do they discuss freely and informally with each other? How has this changed in the last two years?

28. Does this questionnaire cover white and Negro parallel locals in the same trade or shop? Yes___. No___. If yes, answer questions #29 through #36. If no, go on to question #37.

29. Membership of white local_____. Male_____. Female_____.
Membership of Negro local_____. Male_____. Female_____.

30. What is the relation between the two locals on dealings with the employers? What is the role of each in contract negotiations, in the handling of grievances? Do they work together or independently on these matters? Are their roles in dealing with the company equal, and are they both fully represented on committees which deal with matters of concern to both?

31. Does the Negro local have a charter identical with that which the white local has? Yes___. No___. Does it elect all its own officers? Yes___. No___. Does the local and its officers have the same status and rights in the international, the joint board, etc., as the white local and its officers? Yes___. No___. If any of these is no, describe.

32. Give the background of the organization of two separate locals and the history of relations between them, for example, conflicts, attempts at merger, etc.

33. Are there any changes in relations between the locals in the last two years? Yes___. No___. In attitudes toward each other? Yes___. No___. Any proposals for merger? Yes___. No___. If the answers to any of these is yes, give the details.

34. Which activities other than the economic activities described under question #30 do the two locals carry on jointly?

35. How do the two locals compare as organizations? Consider such matters as attendance at meetings, regularity and businesslike character of meetings, handling of grievances, community activity, size of treasury, etc.

36. Do the members of the two locals work at the same places of employment? Yes___. No___. If yes, what are their relations with each other? Do they associate informally, discuss matters freely, etc.? Yes___. No___.

37. Is this a local in a trade in which both races work, but only one race is organized? Yes___. No___. If yes, answer questions #38 through #42. If no, go on to question #43.

38. Which race is organized?_____. How many workers in the local? _____. How many unorganized of same race in jurisdiction?_____. How many of other race?_____.

39. The race that is not organized is excluded by:
___ The constitution of the international.
___ The terms of the local charter.
___ The by-laws of the local.
___ Tradition in the international.
___ Tradition in the local.
If other, explain.

40. Is the unadmitted group excluded from employment in certain crafts or geographical or other subdivisions? Yes___. No___. If yes, which ones?

41. Are the members of the unadmitted group allowed to work on certain unionized jobs? Yes___. No___. Are they expected to have working permits from the local? Yes___. No___. If the answer to either is yes, give the details.

42. Have there been any times when the exclusion of one race has been challenged or has created special problems for the union? Yes___. No___. Have there been any new developments on the admission of the excluded group, or any indications of a change in attitude? Yes___. No___. Has a member of the excluded group holding a card in another local tried to transfer into this local? Yes___. No___. If the answer to either is yes, describe what happened.

43. Does the craft or plant(s) covered by this local employ both white and Negro workers? Yes___. No___. If yes, answer questions #44 through #52. If no, proceed to question #53.

44. The union contract is:
___ National. If so, is it: Industry-wide___. Company-wide___. Other___. If other, explain.
___ Local. If so, is it: Single-employer___. Employers' association___. Other___. If other, explain.

45. The contract provides for separate lines of progression by races___, seniority lists by race___, departmental seniority with Negroes and whites working only in separate departments___, pay differentials___. List other race differences. Does the contract provide for segregation? Yes___. No___. Non-segregation? Yes___. No___. Is there a non-discrimination clause in the contract? Yes___. No___. Have there been any changes affecting these provisions in the last two years? Yes___. No___. If the answer to any of these is yes, please describe.

46. At what jobs are Negroes employed? Maintenance___. Unskilled___. Semi-skilled___. Skilled___. White collar___. Professional___. Supervisory___. Have there been any changes in the last two years? Yes___. No___. If yes, describe.

47. Indicate the areas in which Negroes do not have the same rights on the job: Employment in all categories___. Equal seniority rights___. Equal pay___. Segregation___. List others_____.

48. Management has taken a stand in favor of more economic opportunity for Negroes in the plant. Yes___. No___. If yes, in which areas has management acted? Have there been any changes in company policy or attitude in the last two years? Yes___. No___. If yes, explain.

49. Has the local fought for rights for the Negro which he did not have previously? Yes___. No___. If yes, describe what happened.

50. In which of the areas mentioned in #47 above has the local not taken action so far? What are the main reasons, for example, because the leadership or membership would be opposed, because no one raised the question, because the bargaining position of the local is not strong enough to fight these issues, etc.? Has it been easier___ or harder___ to fight for these things in the last two years?

51. How do the foremen and supervisors act toward Negroes and on the matter of their advancement within the plant? Are there changes in foremen's attitudes in the last two years? If foremen vary greatly, indicate this and give what you believe is the "typical" foreman's role.

52. How do the handling of Negro grievances compare with the handling of white grievances? At the shop steward's level? At the top shop level? At the local union level? Has this changed within the last two years?

53. Whom did you consult in preparing the answers for this local? Indicate the title.

ORGANIZING DRIVE QUESTIONNAIRE

1. Trade, company or plant being organized.

2. City _____ State _____

3. Union doing the organizing _____

4. Has the race issue been raised in opposition to the drive? Yes___. No___. If yes, tell what issues have come up. Who raised them? The boss___, non-union workers___, the press___. List others. In what way was it raised? What did the union do about it, if anything? What effect did it have on the situation? Please attach all relevant leaflets, newsclips, etc.

5. In canvassing new contacts and "undecideds", is the race question raised rarely____, frequently____? As compared with other issues, is this considered as most important___, of average importance___, of minor importance___?

6. Among the union loyalists, has the race question come up as a serious problem? Yes___. No___. If yes, what happened?

7. Are there both white and Negro workers in the work force being organized? Yes___. No___. If only white workers, skip questions #8 through #11. If only Negro workers, skip questions #8 through #10. If yes, how many white males____. White females____. Negro males____. Negro females____.

8. In the plant, which jobs are held only by workers of one race? Do the white and Negro workers have informal day-to-day contact on the job? How are the relations between them currently?

9. Are both white and Negro being organized into the same local? Yes___.No___.

10. Would you say you have recruited a higher___or lower___percentage of Negroes than of whites? Are Negro organizers being used? Yes___. No___.

11. Have civil rights issues been raised by the Negro workers in dealing with union organizers? Yes___. No___. By union organizers in talking to Negro workers? Yes____. No___. If yes on either, which issues were raised?

Obtain the opinions of the leaders of this drive on the following questions:

12. Is the race issue being used more now than it was before the desegregation decision? Yes___. No___. Is it more effective? Yes___. No___.

13. What answers to the criticism of labor's position on this issue have worked best?

14. What could the national organizations do that might help the unions meet these situations?

STATE AND CITY COUNCIL QUESTIONNAIRE

1. Name of state or city council_____ _____
This questionnaire is for: ____AFL state federation or central labor council
____CIO state or city industrial union council
____Merged organization

2. Number of union locals in its jurisdiction _____.
" " " members " " " _____.
If this is a state body, in what cities or regions is the main concentration of union membership?

3. Has the race issue come up within the organization, that is, at the delegated body meetings or at the last convention or the executive board meetings? Yes ____. No____. If yes, give all the relevant facts.

4. Where among the unions in this jurisdiction has the race issue arisen? Name the locals, organizing dirves, geographical regions, etc.

5. Estimated number of all-Negro locals____. Of these, about how many are the counterparts to white locals covering the same crafts or companies?_____. Estimated Negro union membership_____. Estimated number of all-white locals _____. Estimated number of mixed locals_____.

6. If this is a state body, about how many Negro delegates attended the last convention? _____. Total delegates_____. Are there any Negro officers or members of the executive council of the state organization? Yes_____. No_____. If yes, specify.

If this is a city body, how many Negroes are delegates to the central body? _____. Total delegates _____. On the average, how many Negroes attend delegate body meetings? _____. Are there any Negro officers or members of the executive council of the city body? Yes___. No___. If yes, specify which.

7. Has this organization done anything on the questions of segregation, discrimination, White Citizens Councils, etc? Yes___. No___. Are there any ties with other groups concerned about these issues, for example, Southern Regional Council? Yes___. No___. If the answer to either is yes, give further details.

8. In political action has there been any relationship or alliances established by the labor movement with Negro organizations? Yes___. No___. Any effort to encourage Negro voting? Yes___. No___. If the answer to either is yes, give further facts.

9. Has there been any effort to educate the union membership on the current race situation, for example, through the union press, through workers' education institutes? Yes___. No___. If yes, give further facts.

Dissent stirs Steelworkers' ranks

Demands by Negroes for seats on the union's executive board underscore a growing mood of militancy. This and other issues could flare into a revolt against Abel's leadership

In the city where politics is rampant, political questions dominated formal sessions—and the informal hotel room meetings—of the United Steelworkers' convention in Chicago this week.

From the time host Mayor Richard J. Daley, despite pressing labor problems of his own, welcomed the 3,300 delegates with a brief speech, a constant stream of political and labor luminaries took the podium to make rousing demands for a Democratic victory this fall.

If many of the speakers were greeted by only perfunctory applause, there was no denying the enthusiasm for Vice-President Hubert H. Humphrey in his opening-day appearance at the International Amphitheatre. The Steelworkers' response left little doubt that Humphrey will have substantial labor support next week when, in another hall at the Amphitheatre, he will seek the Democratic Party nomination for President.

Greeted by a sea of signs proclaiming, among other things, "We love Hubert," the Vice-President drew standing ovations with his call for "a politics of hope and progress" rather than "despair and fear." In turn, Humphrey, described by USW President I. W. Abel as "the champion of the workingman," promised that if he becomes President, labor will have a "front row seat all the time" at the White House.

Call for victory. Other speakers also called for a Democratic victory so that, in the words of AFL-CIO President George Meany, the labor-Democratic coalition will "move America forward" with programs for the "welfare of the great masses of the American people." Bayard Rustin, executive director of the A. Philip Randolph Institute, urged a coalition of labor and Negro movements to eradicate poverty for whites and blacks.

Al Barkan, director of the AFL-CIO's committee on political education, warned that labor faces "great danger" if it is sidetracked by "phony issues" dramatized by George Wallace or Richard Nixon. "The legislative pipeline . . . is already filled with bills that will cripple collective bargaining."

More important for the future of the Steelworkers, however, were the internal political issues that erupted on the floor and resounded in late-night caucuses in a half-dozen Chicago hotels. With union-wide elections coming up next February, everybody from Abel down to the youngest delegate was angling for votes and influence in what could turn into a political crisis for the nation's third-largest union—and for Abel and his fellow officers, Vice-President Joseph P. Molony and

As of this week, despite rumors that flew about the convention floor, no strongman with recognized political backing had emerged into the open to run against Abel. So far, Abel appears to have a firm grip on the presidency—but dissatisfaction apparently building up in the union over many things could still result in an election challenge.

This possibility was borne out by the hottest issue to hit the floor. Since 1964, a Negro rank-and-file group calling itself the National Ad Hoc Committee has been demanding that Negroes be seated on USW's all-white executive board, which with a recent elimination of five geographical districts numbers 28 members—the three top officers and 25 district directors.

The National Ad Hoc Committee posted pickets outside the convention hall, held daily news conferences, and hinted that unless their demands for two Negroes on the board were met, black unionists might organize against Abel in next year's election.

Turned down. The Abel administration opposed the demands, contending that to create board positions specifically for Negroes (as, for example, the United Auto Workers has done) would be to indulge in "discrimination in reverse."

"I didn't hold office all these years as a Welshman, but as a steelworker," Abel told a pre-convention news conference. Molony, chairman of USW's civil rights committee, said that in some districts Negroes "stand an excellent chance" of being elected. The administration may support a Negro for director in the Baltimore district, which has a large Negro membership and a director due to retire.

None of this satisfied the pro-Negro committee. On Tuesday, when administration-opposed resolutions calling for new board seats hit the floor, six Negro delegates accused the administration of what one called "making beautiful speeches on civil rights without taking action."

"Negroes represent 20% of the Steelworkers' membership," shouted Negro delegate Carl Dickerson. "Even if we got every one of these votes, it would be almost impossible to elect a Negro director."

After speeches by Molony, Abel, and a Negro staff representative, James Jones, the convention rejected the Negroes' resolutions by an overwhelming voice vote. The Ad Hoc Committee, asserting that the action had created an "explosive" situation in the union, called a caucus at midweek to determine what action it would take.

Other political issues also cropped up. On Wednesday, in a rare action, delegates overruled the administration and forced committee resolutions on election reforms. Rank-and-filers especially demand constitutional changes to make it easier for members to run against incumbent district directors.

Mood of militancy. This sort of rift between rank-and-filers and the administration is what could bring about an election revolt next year. Many unionists are angry about the terms of the recently negotiated basic steel contract.

"It's a sham," one local unionist said. "All we get the first year is wages. Everything else is delayed till 1970, but you can bet the companies will get back the cost of the contract with increased prices in the first year."

Other unionists insist, too, that USW is doing "nothing" to counteract worker displacement by new processes in the steel industry. Top administration officials contend that "there is nothing we can do in bargaining to halt plant closedowns and department phaseouts." Only in piecemeal bits, they say, can USW approach the problem in bargaining—with improved benefits, higher pension rates, and a rate retention formula for workers shifted to lower-paid jobs.

"If we'd try to make a great moral issue out of this," said one top union aide, "we'd only delude the people that there is something dramatic we can do."

Many delegates tend to agree with this attitude. But they say the men in the mills are in a militant mood, especially because of initial dissatisfaction with the new steel contract. Time will erode the militancy. But in the meantime, local politicos such as Donald Rarick, perennial rank-and-file candidate for president, are feeding on the "desire for change."

Rarick intends to run against Abel at the head of a ticket called Rank-and-File Team (RAFT). He says he will have district director candidates in most districts, and that he is gaining "powerful support" at the local level. However, he must be nominated by 125 local unions in November in order to run against Abel, and between now and then administration forces will be beating the bushes to knock down what support he does have, mainly among young unionists and not among the old "dues rebels" of a decade ago, when Rarick polled a surprisingly large vote as an unknown running against former USW chief David J. McDonald. End

EV Unions — Discrimination

Mr. William B. Arthur, Editor
Look Magazine
488 Madison Avenue
New York, New York 10022

Dear Mr. Arthur:

LOOK's November 12th article, "A National Disgrace: What Unions Do to Blacks", is itself a disgrace, full of distortions, misinformation, and just plain sloppy reporting.

Your headline falsely charges that most unions have excluded Negroes, forced them into Jim Crow locals when admitted and given them "dirty jobs."

The facts are: Most unions never had any Jim Crow locals; most have always admitted Negroes; almost none hire any workers--black or white--for any jobs, dirty or otherwise.

LOOK in its zeal to back up its rediculous headline published six untrue, sweeping allegations. The truth about each allegation is:

1. There are more than 1.5 million Negroes in unions affiliated with the AFL-CIO.

2. Of the more than 60,000 local unions in the AFL-CIO, less than 150 are now all-Negro and the campaign to merge all-Negro and all-white unions continues, even where some black locals are reluctant to change.

3. Negroes now constitute 3.6% of the apprenticeship force today, which is an increase of more than 100% in ten years. Labor Department figures, before your article was published, showed that Negro participation in apprenticeship has nearly doubled in the past 18 months. In addition to using an outdated figure (an increase from 1.7 to 2.7%), you also used deceptive arithmetic. Such an increase, as any high school math student would tell you, is not a 1% but a 60% increase. And speaking of "tokenism," do you dare tell your readers the percentage of senior editors--or just plain reporters--on LOOK who are black?

4. Unions, including building trades, not only have an open-door policy for apprentices but are engaged in programs to recruit Negro journeymen, among them the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers and the Plumbers.

5. Non-union craftsmen, black and white, make considerably less money than organized workers do. That is why unions exist. That is why, according to BUSINESS WEEK, unorganized workers--black and white--are flocking to trade unions.

6. Long before the 1964 Civil Rights Act--for which organized labor fought as far back as World War II--unions had sought to eliminate segregated seniority and they continue to do so. Remember, seniority is a contract item and it takes two parties to write a contract. Also, management often balks at union attempts to improve seniority systems.

These six items cover only about one-third of the distortions in the LOOK article. It would take the same amount of space allotted to Mr. Star to answer them all.

I refer to such statements as "Not a single Negro has been admitted into any of the five (construction) locals in Newark, N.J." and the charge that there are no Negro locomotive firemen. Both are absolutely untrue, were untrue when Mr. Star wrote them, and could have been easily checked by an editor interested in honest reporting.

Further, the article also deceives by what it omits. No mention is made of the successful program to seek out and recruit minority group youngsters for building trades apprenticeship now being conducted in 44 major cities. In Cleveland, for instance, 150 Negro apprentices are now in training, of these 15 are Iron Workers and more than 25 are in the Plumbers program. In Washington, 160 Negro youths are training for highly paid construction jobs.

Mr. Star apparently used his research time to find six cases of alleged discrimination. By using six photographs with cleverly written captions, LOOK implies that these experiences are typical. In some cases the caption is untrue. (For instance, the two Richmond locals of the United Paper Makers Union had voted to merge before your issue was published--a fact any cub reporter could have discovered.) He also could have learned that the union here wiped out wage differentials between blacks and whites (common to non-union plants) at the bargaining table more than 15 years ago.

Or take the case of Mr. Dobbins, who incidentally is now a union electrician. The implication is that the IBEW has a policy of discrimination. The fact is that the vast majority of IBEW locals are now implementing the policy of involvement in a cooperative recruiting program to interest black workers in becoming union electricians.

We make no claim to perfection and would welcome a constructive critique of our progress in civil rights. For there has been progress and we intend that it continue despite attempts such as Mr. Star's to discourage young Negroes from looking for work. Labor is not and has not been the foe of the quest for a better life. Indeed, it has often been the only group fighting for this goal. And invariably, it has succeeeded despite the hostility of that segment of the press, which cares neither for the truth nor the cause--and would sacrifice both for sensational headlines.

Yours truly,

William F. Schnitzler

Chairman
AFL-CIO Civil Rights Committee

DENNIS ASKS RETRACTION

'Look' Accused of Falsehoods In Article on Unions and Blacks

"Libelous misstatements" were charged to Look Magazine last week by President C. L. Dennis of the Railway and Airline Clerks—and he strongly demanded a retraction.

Dennis blasted a highly sensationalized article carried in the Nov. 12 issue of Look entitled "A National Disgrace: What Unions Do to Blacks." The magazine appeared on the newsstands Oct. 29.

The Clerks' leader declared that the article "completely misstates the facts as they relate" to alleged discrimination in his Brotherhood; also, its publication just before the election constituted "a dishonest attempt to influence voters."

Dennis called upon Look to publish a "complete retraction" of the article, correcting the record as it relates to the Railway Clerks. He provided facts for such a correction.

For example, the article said that in the Brotherhood "Negro freight handlers were replaced by less senior white workers who had been in the all-white baggage clerks seniority line."

Answered Dennis: "There is not one known instance under any of our more than 200 rules and working conditions agreements where one Negro freight handler was displaced by a white employe with less seniority."

"In no instance," he continued, "can an individual covered by our agreements displace a senior employee—and race, creed, color or sex has absolutely nothing to do with seniority under our agreements."

Another claim in the article that "Negroes have no seniority" in a white local and "therefore their jobs are out" was blasted by Dennis as "patently untrue and pure fantasy."

Further, the article says there are no Negro ticket clerks, and this was branded by Dennis as "completely untrue."

"I personally know of quite a few Negro ticket sellers working in several major passenger terminals in the United States," Dennis declared. He went to list names of some of them and the place where they work.

"It is always disturbing," the Clerks' leader went on, "that a magazine of the stature and circulation of Look constantly and consistently reports on the negative aspects of a story.

"Once in a while, it would be nice to read about the good work that is being done to solve some of the social ills of this nation instead of reading outright lies designed to weaken the labor movement.

"Our Brotherhood has participated in many joint ventures establishing on-the-job training programs designed to upgrade the arts, talents and skills of its membership. These agreements are open to all members regardless of race, creed, color or sex."

Dennis closed by saying he hoped that "an appropriate retraction" to the article would be published in an "early issue" of Look.

Rough draft

Mr. Jack Star
Senior Editor
LOOK MAGAZINE
New York, New York

Dear Sir:

I have just read the first four paragraphs of your feature--A National Disgrace--WHAT UNIONS DO TO BLACKS and I am compelled already to charge you not only with outright bias, but with outright lies.

Mr. Star, at such a crucial period in our history, when lack of understanding, lack of objectivity, is causing unprecedented chaos in our land, such distorted reporting as you presented in the November 12 issue of LOOK is outright criminal. One can only conclude that it has for its motive the aim of driving away black voters from the political party which has worked so long and arduously to bring about needed changes in our society.

You wrote, "Four years ago, the Locomotive Firemen finally took the clause out, but there still aren't any Negro Firemen. Negroes, by the way, had traditionally been firemen in the coal-burning days, but the unions forced them out when diesel locomotives were introduced."

Mr. Star, although the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen has yet to hire the first railroad fireman, I want you to know that railroads all over this country have hired and are hiring railroad firemen, in the North, East, West and, yes, in the South.

Furthermore, when these men are hired they have the privilege of joining this organization, which most of them do immediately. Only recently I met negro firemen, members of the BLF&E, at a function in Little Rock, Arkansas. Before that several joined in meetings in Buffalo, New York, where I was privileged to speak to them and other members of the BLF&E. In these two specific instances the railroads on which these negro firemen are employed are the Missouri Pacific and Penn Central Railroads.

You state categorically that "unions forced them (black firemen) out when diesel locomotives were introduced."

There is not a shred of truth in this statement.

Mr. Star, I am sure you do not care to know the truth, otherwise you would have researched your subject before sitting down to your typewriter, but here is the truth of the matter, anyway.

If any negro firemen were forced out, as you say, as a result of the diesel revolution in our industry, I am unaware of it. But, if you mean that they lost out as a result of the infamous arbitration award which took firemen--black and white--from their posts in locomotives, I suggest to you that this is still another story. More than 20,000 lost out--black and white.

And while we are on this subject, let me tell you that we have fought as no other organization has ever fought big business to bring back those needed firemen--black or white--with publications such as yours often joining to block our efforts.

Mr. Star, the need for understanding, the need for racial peace, the need for objectivity has never been greater than it is right now. Such warped reasoning and unfounded statements as appear in this article should be suspect at any time. But, coming at a time like this proves beyond any question that your interests lie not in informing for the sake of informing, but rather writing for the sake of sensationalism.

You have done your readers and our country a great disservice by publishing such unfounded statements that appear at the beginning of your article. But, what is worse, you may have sown the seeds of yet another disorder, yet another riot.

This to me seems to be a terrible price for sensationalism.

Sincerely,

Dear Mr. Rubin:

I find it regrettable that you did not bother to check with us about references made to United Papermakers and Paperworkers in the November 12 issue of Look, which will be on the stands, as you state, tomorrow.

The picture of Brother Willie W. Simpson on Page 37 is a member of Local 528, which was merged with Local 548 by voluntary vote of the membership sometime ago.

Further, I can advise you that the issues which concern the Crown Zellerbach case at Bogalusa have been almost totally resolved by stipulation and agreement among the parties, but endless reference to these difficult circumstances in a national magazine do not make our task easier, unless the intent is to discredit unions generally.

Finally, I can advise you that through collective bargaining over fifteen years ago this Union wiped out the racial wage differential in the paper industry, which today remains common in unorganized plants. The fact is the negro members of UPP working in the southern paper industry are probably the highest paid industrial manufacturing workers, with the possible exception of Birmingham steel workers and Atlanta auto workers. We are rather proud of these achievements, and are more than somewhat weary of being included in the general stoning by people like Herbert Hill.

STEEL PLANT BIAS HEARING IS RESUMED

Negroes Are Locked In By Bethlehem System, D.C. Panel Is Told

By NAOMI S. ROVNER
[Washington Bureau of The Sun]

Washington, Feb. 3 — Government witnesses testified today that Negro employees at the Bethlehem Steel Plant in Sparrows Point are still "locked" into a discriminatory seniority system which effectively blocks their advancement.

The testimony came as hearings resumed on charges by the United States Department of Labor that the steel company has violated nondiscrimination rules which must be adhered to if it is to receive government contracts.

Unable To Transfer

Three Negro employees of Bethlehem and a former white employment interviewer at the plant led off the government case, which holds that Negro employees there are frozen into "any of the most dirty, dangerous, low-paying jobs."

Johnny Fair, a 37-year-old mechanic's helper at Sparrows Point, testified he had started working at the plant in 1955 in the acid cleaning section of the coke ovens department.

He told the three-man hearing panel that he was unable to transfer to a job which had a higher paying top category until 1966, and found when he did transfer that he had lost all the seniority he had built up in the jobs which are traditionally filled at the plant by Negroes.

"I Was The Victim"

He said the effect of this rule was that, although he had worked for the company for 12 years, he was the first man to be given a lower paying job during a company curtailment last year.

He said: "You transfer at your own risk, because at the first cutback you're the one to get it. That's why a lot of men are not willing to take the risk."

"I was the victim of this myself last year," Mr. Fair said, and added that he had taken a pay cut of $40 a week.

The hearings, expected to continue for at least a week, are being held before a panel of three labor lawyers and arbitrators. They are the Rev. Dexter L. Hanley, S. J., of the Georgetown University Law School, the panel chairman; Peter Seitz, of New York, and Lloyd H. Bailer, of Los Angeles.

A new battery of government lawyers, headed by William Fauver, a special counsel for Labor Department's contract compliance office, is presenting the case before the panel, which has only advisory authority.

"Years And Decades"

Many observers anticipate that the case, involving the possible cancellation of more than $50 million in government contracts, and perhaps three times that amount in sub-contracts, could still wind up in a long Federal Court litigation.

In his opening statement today, Mr. Fauver said that in order to prove that the company is not now complying with the rules against racial bias, the government would have to show "the rigorous, traditional and historical racial discrimination," which he alleged has been going on at the plant "for years and decades."

He called the group of employees who came to the plant and were placed in the traditionally "Negro job categories" the "locked-in generation."

The first witness for the government today was Stanton Collins, a 35-year-old Reisterstown resident who is employed by the Social Security Administration.

He said he had spent four summers, while he was in college, working as an interviewer in the Sparrows Point steel plant employment office.

"Initial Screening"

He said he conducted "initial screening and processing of job applicants," and he testified that although the application forms contained no questions as to race, he and the other interviewers coded them with a circled number "1," designating a white, and a "2," showing a Negro applicant.

He said he was told each morning how many jobs were open and which jobs were reserved for white applicants and which for black.

He said the "Negro-only jobs" were in the general labor force, in the glass furnaces, the coke ovens and the open hearth department. Policemen, firemen, apprentices, skilled and clerical jobs were reserved for whites, he said.

He testified that he was instructed by one particular supervisor to look for "big black niggers" to fill the heavy laborer positions open.

Mr. Collins also testified that the supervisor had demonstrated a deep prejudice against Negroes in a personal conversation with him.

Harsh Obscenity

"We're both Catholics," Mr. Collins said, "and maybe that's why he showed me a religious picture one of his children had brought home from Sunday school . . . showing Christ . . . with his arms open to a Negro child with a caption something like 'Whatever You Do For The Least Of My Brethren, You Do For Me.' "

The government worker then testified that his supervisor had used a harsh obscenity to discount the picture's message.

On cross examination, Ralph L. McAfee questioned Mr. Collins's "phenomenal memory," established that the young man had serious vision problems and that he had got his summer jobs only because his father and grandfather were Bethlehem employees.

The company lawyer also brought out records which showed that Mr. Collins's father had at one time been demoted and "retired early."

Mr. Collins told the Bethlehem representative that he had been approached by Lawrence Ageloff, identified as a former active member of the Congress of Racial Equality to recount his Sparrows Point experiences to Labor Department investigators.

Union Procedures Unhelpful

In later testimony Mr. Fair, and Joseph Butler, 42, a graduate of Howard University in Washington who worked only in menial jobs at the Sparrows Point plant from 1955 to 1968, indicated that the grievance procedures of the locals of the United Steelworkers of America (AFL-CIO) had not been helpful to Negroes seeking to move into better jobs.

Mr. Fair was asked by the Bethlehem laywer if he had availed himself of the union grievance procedures and the former acid cleaner answered: "Yes I did—that grievance ran up and ran down and I never did get the truth.

"I heard it was withdrawn by the union," he testified, "but I was not notified."

Mr. Butler, who came to Bethlehem with a bachelor of arts degree and a college major in German, from a $35-a-week job in a Washington parking lot, said he was given an unskilled job in the coke ovens on a "take-it-or-leave-it basis."

Now a mechanic's helper, Mr. Butler said he served as a shop steward in 1964 and as recording secretary of the union's civil rights committee in 1967.

He told the panel of "tests" that had been established for Negroes wishing to transfer to the previously unavailable skilled jobs and characterized them as "merely barriers to keep Negroes from promoting."

He told the group that Mr. Fair's transfer problems had been resolved only after the civil rights committee had "after hard negotiations" convinced the company to drop some of the tests in areas where none had existed before the 1960 executive order barring discrimination.

In addition to the government and company legal teams, the steelworkers and the legal defense fund of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People were represented today.

Both major parties in the case have filed new briefs with the panel, the government alleging continued racial bias against the mammoth steel plant's more than 8,000 Negro employees, and the company denying them.

As the government case continues tomorrow, witnesses are expected to produce charts and graphs which have been run through sophisticated computers to back up the bias charges.

POVERTY BOARD

which are expected to be followed.

It recommended, first, that the agency's "national emphasis" programs—including Head Start, legal services; Upward Bound, comprehensive health services and family planning—"be spun off to other agencies as soon as they are firmly established.

It also recommended that the Job Corps program be discontinued as a "separate entity" within the poverty agency and be transferred to the Department of Labor or the Department of Health, Education and Welfare.

At the same time, however, it urged the incoming Administration not to dismantle the Office of Economic Opportunity but, instead, to change its name and convert it into an agency largely concerned with the invention and protection—the "care and feeding"—of experimental antipoverty efforts that might otherwise suffocate in the vast executive departments.

The "reconstituted" poverty agency would also continue to manage the network of local community action agencies established under its auspices over the last several years and designed to encourage citizens' participation and self-help activities.

Finally, the agency would also, under the team's recommendations, assume jurisdiction over neighborhood "community development corporations" called for in legislation now pending before Congress.

The legislation is designed to create incentives for neighborhood residents to form community business ventures.

The team's report recommended that the "spinning-off" of the poverty agency's major program functions should properly begin with Head Start, which it described as "ready for delegation" to another department.

This evening a ranking White House official all but confirmed that Head Start would be the first poverty program to leave its present home.

He pointed out that the principal architect of Head Start, Jule Sugarman, had moved over to the Department of Health, Education and Welfare six months ago. Asked what Mr. Sugarman was doing in his new post, the official replied: "He's waiting for his program to arrive."

Poverty Aide Takes a Long View

By JOSEPH A. LOFTUS
Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Jan. 31 — Alviso, Calif., is a little mud town about an hour out of San Francisco, inhabited by a few thousand Mexican-American migrant workers.

Their poverty level made them eligible to apply for a community health center, financed by the Office of Economic Opportunity. They had no doctors and little hope of getting any.

Then somebody read in a newspaper that two San Francisco doctors were in tax trouble and were about to be jailed. A few of the migrants went to San Francisco and suggested to the authorities that there was a place worse than jail—Alviso.

The authorities agreed, and Alviso got its doctors, and an attractive health center that cost the taxpayers less than $20,000. The men of Alviso built it themselves. It is still operating and has its own medical staff.

Cooperation by Doctors

The experience in Alviso is significant because it tells something important about the poverty program that does not readily meet the eye — the program has gradually led to changes in some of the more conservative institutions in the nation.

The decision to assign the two doctors to Alviso, rather than to jail, required the cooperation of two of those institutions — the tax and judicial fraternities. It also bequired the support of organized medicine, which, contrary to early expectations, has helped to establish 40 other comprehensive family medical centers set up by O.E.O. in poor neighborhoods.

At the moment, the antipoverty agency is in the spotlight because of the disappearance of $2.7-million in antipoverty funds in New York City, criticism that too much policy discretion has been given to the poor, and the apparent determination of the Nixon Administration to reduce the agency's operational area.

Bertrand M. Harding, a career civil servant who is now director of the agency, says that he sees the agency in a longer, broader perspective but concedes that the staff's daily diet of incoming news has not been good for morale.

Function of Agency

When the story of the agency is told in that longer, broader perspective, Mr. Harding believes, its impact may be measured less in the number of dollars spent (or stolen), or in the number of individuals raised above the poverty line, and more in the institutional changes effected.

"America has probably seen more institutional change in the last few years than in any similar period of our history," the director says.

For that he gives the antipoverty agency a large part of the credit, or blame. Its function never was to distribute dollars to the poor but to change the circumstances that made and helped keep some people poor.

To the comfortable, "change" can be a threatening word, Mr. Harding says. It has brought criticism and resistance. But, even so, he says, many significant changes have been accepted in the institutions of law, medicine, education, and even religion. The changes, in his view, literally run into the hundreds, but they have low visibility — often low, local visibility.

Finds Conservative Institutions Being Slowly Changed

Change Among Lawyers

For example, the American legal fraternity used to be virtually a closed institution. About 1 per cent of the lawyers came from minority groups, Mr. Harding estimated.

The antipoverty agency has now been joined by the American and National Bar Associations and the American Association of Law Schools in actively recruiting members of minority groups into law schools and the legal profession. Last year the agency provided the Council on Legal Education Opportunity $500,000 to facilitate the entry into law schools of at least 300 minority group students.

Law school curriculums have changed, too. More than 90 law schools are offering courses in poverty law and some have set up neighborhood law offices and clinics, financed in some cases by the agency's research and demonstration grants.

The impact has been so great that 15 states have passed laws to permit second- and third-year law students to engage in limited practice.

Rights for Tenants

Poverty law deals with such problems as tenant rights and fraudulent consumer contracts and other special problems of the poor.

A project of the antipoverty agency at the University of Detroit Law School led the Michigan Legislature to enact laws that gave tenants a new bill of rights. The new laws made building code enforcement a civil matter and gave tenants the right to go directly to court instead of contending with the municipal bureaucracy and political wire-pulling.

These laws also require that all leases include a pledge by the landlord to keep the premises in "livable" condition. They hold that tenants may not be evicted for exercising lawful rights, such as reporting code violations.

Another institution undergoing change because of the antipoverty agency is education. Project Head Start was established for disadvantaged preschool children four years ago over the opposition of many experts and school boards. Now that two million children have been served in more than 13,000 Head Start centers, few experts seriously deny the value of the program.

New View in Clergy

Higher education has also been affected. About 300 colleges are operating an Upward Bound program to stimulate the under-achieving, C-average high school student to continue his education. Typically, the 7,500 young people who have been served by college students in the program came from poverty backgrounds and were candidates for perpetuating that poverty.

Churches typically used to preach a religion of success. The churches more and more have been preaching a religion of compassion.

A lot of ministers, priests and rabbis came to believe that the slum was where they should be because that was where men were suffering most. The National Council of Churches operate migrant labor programs. Ministers and priests are on Community Action boards, and hundreds of nuns teach in Head Start programs.

On the local level, Community Action agencies have stimulated institutional change in many different ways.

In Camden, N.J., for example, the local poverty agency persuaded physicians and 45 pharmacists to help poor, elderly citizens by providing many drugs under their generic names instead of the higher-priced trade-name versions of the same drugs.

Sanitary District Formed

In southern Alameda County, Calif., the Community Action agency developed a policy of organizing programs and spinning them off to established agencies. For example, it organized volunteer teachers for an adult language and literacy class that was taken over and expanded by the school system.

It organized a child care center with nonprofessional aides that is to be taken over by the school system and linked with a job training program.

It researched the need for dewage facilities, leading to the formation of a sanitary district by three cities — Fremont, Newark and Union City.

The antipoverty program, with O.E.O. at its center, has given high visibility nationally to the one-seventh of Americans who were poor. Community Action agencies achieved that on the local level, each in its own way with its own programs under local initiative.

A Voice for the Poor

Through many of these agencies the poor have found a voice and a platform, and in some cases they literally marched on city hall. Many politicians felt threatened, and they in turn threatened the antipoverty program.

A 1967 amendment to the Economic Opportunity Act gave local elected officials authority to take over Community Action agencies. Few did. Community Action's militant advocacy in the early days has simmered down without stilling the voices of the poor.

Robert A. Levine, who recently resigned as the antipoverty agency's assistant director for research, plans, programs and evaluation, summed it up this way:

"In the early days, Community Action did have a tendency to mount its horse and charge in all directions, piercing many windmills with many lances. To some extent this is still true, and there are still some people in O.E.O. who wish it were even more true. But they are not directing Community Action. And community action is not going to go away."

WIRTZ REPORT

"The department (like the government as a whole) has not yet found the significantly new ways that are necessary to attract top-flight college graduates in substantial numbers. This could be the single, most ominous long-range problem in government administration today," he decided.

Joint Application

The snail's pace of progress was illustrated in Wirtz's report of an accomplishment—a joint application for use by local governments seeking funds under 28 federal programs run by four federal agencies.

Wirtz prided himself on staying out of labor-management disputes, especially toward the end of his five-year tenure. He feels strongly that Cabinet officers should not intervene because the parties can solve their own problems more effectively.

When he took office in the wake of master troubleshooter Arthur J. Goldberg, however, the Labor Department scene was far different: "Haggard men spending the night glaring at each other across the bargaining table, while the press and radio and television crews kept death watches in the corridors."

Wirtz listed a long series of accomplishments, ranging from a sharp increase in the number of Negroes in high-level posts to the establishment of the $2 billion Manpower Administration to train unemployed workers.

But, he said, the new secretary and his aides cannot relax their vigilance.

"An administrative situation that had become almost frozen is now fluid," Wirtz said. "But if the custodians of inertia are in retreat, they have not disbanded."

Nixon Aides to Seek Tighter Fiscal Rein On H.R.A. Projects

By MARTIN TOLCHIN
Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Feb. 5—The Nixon Administration will follow the lead of its predecessor and seek tighter fiscal control and improved programing for New York's antipoverty agency, city officials were told today.

"The city and the Labor Department are working cooperatively to achieve more effective controls," said a member of the Administration.

The Labor Department provides funds for most of the city's antipoverty programs dealing with manpower and career training.

George P. Shultz, the Secretary of Labor, and his aides also told Mayor Lindsay and the Human Resources Administrator, Mitchell I. Ginsberg, and their aides that the Federal Government would seek to provide increased technical assistance to improve programs and fiscal management.

The Federal officials also said they would strive for prompt financing of the city's antipoverty programs, to end their hand-to-mouth existence.

"We are aware that late funding is a problem, particularly for New York City," said a high official of the Labor Department. "Earlier funding is desirable."

He declined to say whether the Nixon Administration would recommend legislation to ease this problem.

Mr. Ginsberg said that "we have long urged the Federal Government to provide us with more technical assistance, and we certainly welcome their offer."

"We have also been trying to make it clear for many years that early funding is absolutely essential to both effective programs and efficient management," Mr. Ginsberg said. "We are delighted to receive the Federal Government's commitment to making this possible."

The two-hour meeting in Secretary Shultz's office was termed "very constructive" by Mayor Lindsay and "cordial" by the Labor Department official, who asked not to be identified.

The official added: "We don't have the legacy of recrimination that developed over the months between our predecessors and the city."

Youth Corps Plans

The Mayor said after the meeting that he would submit plans for the city's summer program of the Neighborhood Youth Corps program "very soon, within the next month." That program provides jobs for slum teen-agers

Mr. Lindsay, asked whether there was a deadline for submitting the plans, replied: "We didn't discuss deadlines. We don't have any deadlines."

The Labor Department official commented: "A deadline implies that you're hitting somebody over the head. Here there is willingness to comply. We talked about scheduling certain steps."

The Federal officials told the Mayor and his aides that the city was expected to implement major parts of an audit previously condemned by Mr. Ginsberg as "totally false."

The audit, by W. M. O'Reilly, was not mentioned by name, but many of the recommendations were referred to. The audit was highly critical of nearly all fiscal operations of the Human Resources Administration, the superagency that administers the city's $1.6-billion welfare program and its $122-million antipoverty program.

On Jan. 15, commenting on the O'Reilly report, Mr. Ginsberg declared:

"I think the report is utterly false, but I am not saying that there are not points that are not correct. Any idiot can make a report, and if you find it, it will be on the front page of The New York Times."

This was obviously a reference to disclosures made in The Times last week about irregularities and corruption in the Human Resources Administration.

The H.R.A.'s most glaring deficiencies, the O'Reilly audit said, were the absence of a general ledger to record and control transactions affecting assets, liabilities, fund equity, received and expenditures; and the absence of any financial reports reflecting financial conditions.

Mr.Ginsberg said today that "some of the specifics that were mentioned "at today's meeting" had been proposed by Mr. O'Reilly and others, but the report was not mentioned specifically."

"Certainly we are all interested in improving fiscal controls," Mr. Ginsberg said. "We had discussions of the safeguards that have been developed and already implemented by H.R.A."

"In addition," he said, "we discussed a few additional measures proposed by the Labor Department, and all expressed confidence that complete agreement on a whole range of necessary safeguards will be reached shortly."

In a related development, the Congressional task force investigating the City's antipoverty program has resolved to begin an extensive investigation of H. R. A.'s inventory "to see if equipment is tagged state and city property," Representative Hugh L. Carey, the group's chairman, said today.

Mr. Carey, a Brooklyn Democrat, said he hoped Mr. Lindsay and Mr. Ginsberg "would not be asking for more relaxed treatment, but would be coming forward with new ideas."

UNION BACKS BETHLEHEM

Says Anti-Bias Action May Alter Negotiated Policies

By NAOMI S. ROVNER
[Washington Bureau of The Sun]

Washington, Feb. 5—A top official of the United Steelworkers of America (AFL-CIO) put his union in the Bethlehem Steel Corporation's camp today at federal hearings into government charges of racial bias at Bethlehem's Sparrows Point facility.

Ben Fisher, the USW's chief contract administrator, told a three-man fact-finding panel that if proposals from the Federal Office of Contract Compliance to end discrimination were implemented, decades of union-company negotiated policies and procedures would be negated, or made impossible to administer.

He also charged that the Labor Department's Bureau of Apprentice and Training was itself perpetuating discrimination through its required entrance rules which effectively bar persons with limited formal education.

The compliance office, when it found that discrimination did, in fact, exist at the plant, ordered Bethlehem to permit workers to change jobs and be promoted on the basis of their length of service in the plant, rather than in a particular unit.

The bureau also told the company it must permit employees to transfer without a loss in pay, even when the new job carries a lower rate.

"Invitation To Chaos"

In their trial brief, Bethlehem attorneys called the proposal "an express invitation to chaos in a steel plant."

In his testimony today Mr. Fisher appeared to uphold this contention.

Remedies "Unworkable"

He called the bias remedies proposed by the government "entirely unworkable," and claimed that "any wholesale change would subvert the whole [rate] system and probably destroy its very existence."

Under careful questioning from George H. Cohen, a Washington-based lawyer for the union, Mr. Fisher explained that the union had for years tried to negotiate a rational assignment of rates to jobs rather than individuals out of the pre-1944 "jungle wage system," and had been able to do so only with favorable war labor board rulings."

"The minute you have people paid at different rates on the same job you have problems," the veteran negotiator declared.

Negroes "Locked In"

The government's case against the Sparrows Point plant, one of the largest steel-making facilities in the world, holds in large part that the loss of "unit seniority"—used for layoff, recall and promotion purposes—which occurs in all voluntary transfers to other units has created a "frozen-in generation" of Negro workers who were assigned to the "hotter and dirtier" departments years ago and are now effectively "locked in."

But Mr. Fisher upheld today the company's contention that using years of service in the plant rather than in a unit would be inefficient and harmful to morale, and would compromise plant safety and destroy job security.

The day's most hostile exchange occurred as William Fauver, the chief of the government's legal team, opened his crossexamination of the steel union official.

Isolation And Discrimination

Referring again to the Justice Department's case against Bethlehem's Lackawanna plant in Buffalo, Mr. Fauver cited Mr. Fisher's contention there that

OEO increases funds for hard-core jobs

An increase in Fiscal Year 1969 of employment programs for the hard-core unemployed, funded with monies appropriated to OEO, has been announced by Bertrand M. Harding, acting director of OEO.

Out of the $1.948 billion appropriation approved by Congress in October, $937 million has been allocated to employment programs for the current fiscal year, as compared to $807 million obligated for such programs in Fiscal Year 1968. (Fiscal years begin July 1 and end June 30).

Other OEO programs in Fiscal 1969 will generally continue at existing levels with the cost of on-going programs rising somewhat above the previous fiscal year. This is largely because of one-time economies for the Neighborhood Youth Corps in Fiscal Year 1968 that are not available again, re-funding of Fiscal 1967 projects which needed no funds in 1968, and increases for projects either started or still building in the previous year.

THE LARGEST increase in OEO allocations is for the JOBS Program (Job Opportunities in the Business Sector). The allocation goes up to $162 million as contrasted with $70 million in Fiscal Year 1968. The program is operated by the National Alliance of Businessmen in a cooperative venture with government.

As approved by the Bureau of the Budget, the allocation to JOBS will provide for 70,000 employment slots, which President Johnson specified when he inaugurated the program last year.

Other employment programs which will be increased slightly are the Concentrated Employment Program, up to $83 million from $74 million, and the Special Impact Program, up to $22 million from $20 million.

The out-of-school Neighborhood Youth Corps Program will go from $96 million in Fiscal 1968 to $130 million in Fiscal 1969; Operation Mainstream from $22 million to $41 million; summer Neighborhood Youth Corps from $114 million to $125 million; and New Careers from $8 million to $19 million.

The increased allocations will provide a greater investment in programs that serve the elderly poor. At the same time, assistance to the poor in rural areas will receive increased emphasis through the strengthening of current programs in these areas.

IN OTHER PROGRAM areas the Head Start appropriation will remain at $318 million; Head Start Follow-Through will go from $15 million to $30 million; Comprehensive Health Centers from $33 million to $60 million; Family Planning $9 million to $13 million; Emergency Food and Medical, $13 million to $17 million; Legal Services $36 million to $42 million; Local Initiative, $321 million to $332 million; and Upward Bound, $32 million to $30 million.

The Job Corps will drop from $282 million to $280 million. Migrant programs will be up from $25 million to $27 million; VISTA up from $29 million to $32 million.

The small decrease in Job Corps and Upward Bound allocations do not reflect a reduction in the level of activity in those programs. Because of carry-over funds, these programs carry the same or an increased number of slots for Fiscal Year 1969.

IN TERMS of persons served:

Full-year Head Start will remain constant at 218,000.

Summer Head Start will remain at 477,000.

The Job Corps remains at 36,000 slots.

VISTA is up from 4,300 slots to 4,900.

Upward Bound from 25,000 to 26,000.

Comprehensive Health Centers from 960,000 served to 998,000.

Legal Services from 475,000 to 600,000.

Aides Plan to Keep Training Unit Open

Directors of the Opportunities Industrialization Center said Thursday they plan to keep the South-Central Los Angeles vocational training facility open despite the pullout of federal funds.

OIC's board elected a new acting director, Clarence Shaw, 31, an assistant program coordinator of the County Probation Department's Volunteers in Service to Offenders project.

The Economic and Youth Opportunities Agency, local community action agency, last week ordered a phaseout of funds for OIC from federal sources—the Office of Economic Opportunity, Department of Health, Education and Welfare and the Labor Department.

The local OIC, which offers basic and motivational education at a feeder center in Watts and vocational training at 6135 S. Central Ave., originally was formed here by ministers and other black community figures as part of a nationwide self-help program headquartered in Philadelphia.

How OEO divided funds

OEO's division of the $1.948 billion fiscal year 1969 appropriation shows a sharp new emphasis on programs to recruit, train and hire the hard core unemployed.

For the first time in OEO's history, community action programs have been displaced as the largest single money recipient among the anti-poverty agency's parts.

Congress decided upon the $1.948 billion figure. OEO officials then divided the money among their various programs.

They did have some guidlines for the allocations from Congress in the authorization bill and legislative history on some other measures.

Here is a partial breakdown of the OEO decisions on allocations for fy 1969, as compared with fy 1967 and 1968.

Unions — Black Separatism

RWDSU 2/9/69 Record

'Black Militants' Allied With Bosses In New Drive Against Union Shop

WASHINGTON, D. C.—The National Right to Work Committee apparently intends to exploit the nation's poorer-paid workers—Negroes, farm workers and public employees—in its efforts to destroy the union shop.

The committee, which is supported by money from anti-union employers, paraded spokesmen for its latest strategy at a press conference here. Among those who spoke were:

- Ben Howard of Los Angeles, a former UAW member, who spoke out for black separatism and dual unionism as a leader of a California group called Black Workers Alliance.
- Jose Mendoza, self-styled farm worker, who has been touring the country with financial help from the committee in an effort to undermine the grape workers' strike in California.
- James Nixon, a Negro, who has brought suit in an attempt to knock out an agency shop contract negotiated between the City of Detroit and State, County & Municipal Employes Council 77.

Howard said that his alliance hopes to raid established unions in California to form "separate" black unions. Under questioning he conceded this was "dual unionism" and he might run into trouble securing elections under the Taft-Hartley law.

Howard, who said he is vice chairman of the western region of the Congress on Racial Equality, distributed copies of a resolution passed by Los Angeles CORE supporting the open shop.

Asked whether his CORE chapter was typical of others, he admitted he knew of no other CORE group that had come out against the union shop.

He claimed that "there have been moves" within the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People and the Southern Christian Leadership Conference "to combat" the union shop. He couldn't specifically identify any. When a reporter reminded him that the late Dr. Martin Luther King, who formerly headed SCLC, was a strong supporter of the union shop, Howard nodded assent.

Asked why he was no longer a member of UAW Local 887 at North American-Rockwell, an aircraft manufacturer, he said he was promoted out of the bargaining unit into a supervisory post at the plant.

It was brought out that North American-Rockwell has a union shop contract, which was overwhelmingly approved in a 1968 referendum conducted among the firm's 21,000 workers.

Mendoza told how the committee "has sponsored me on tours" through the United States in opposition to the AFL-CIO United Farm Workers Organizing Committee's boycott of grape growers who refuse to recognize or bargain with the union or to permit an election among the grape pickers.

He identified himself as general secretary of Farm Workers—Freedom to Work, which he said was formed "after a series of workers' rallies last fall" to oppose UFWOC.

A spokesman for UFWOC in Delano, Calif., said the organization was formed with financial backing from Giumarra Vineyards of Bakersfield and several other grape growers who have opposed union rights for their workers.

'Benign Neglect' for Issue of Race?

By DANIEL P. MOYNIHAN

Mr. Moynihan, counselor to President Nixon, wrote this text as a "memorandum to the President."

As the new year begins, it occurs to me that you might find useful a general assessment of the position of Negroes at the end of the first year of your Administration, and of the decade in which their position has been the central domestic political issue.

In quantitative terms, which are reliable, the American Negro is making extraordinary progress. In political terms, somewhat less reliable, this would also appear to be true. In each case, however, there would seem to be countercurrents that pose a serious threat to the welfare of the blacks and the stability of the society, white and black.

1. Employment and Income

The nineteen-sixties saw the great breakthrough for blacks. A third (32%) of all families of Negro and other races earned $8,000 or more in 1968 compared, in constant dollars, with 15% in 1960.

The South is still a problem. Slightly more than half (52%) of the Negro population lived in the South in 1969. There, only 19% of families of Negro and other races earned over $8,000.

Young Negro families are achieving income parity with young white families. Outside the South, young husband-wife Negro families have 99% of the income of whites! For families headed by a male age 25 to 34, the proportion was 87%. Thus, it may be this ancient gap is finally closing.

Income reflects employment, and this changed dramatically in the nineteen-sixties. Blacks continued to have twice the unemployment rates of whites, but these were down for both groups. In 1969, the rate for married men of Negro and other races was only 2.5%. Teen-agers, on the other hand, continued their appalling rates: 24.4% in 1969.

Black occupations improved dramatically. The number of professional and technical employes doubled in the period 1960-68. This was two and a half times the increase for whites. In 1969, Negro and other races provided 10% of the other-than-college teachers. This is roughly their proportion of the population (11%). Is it an improvement

2. Education

In 1968, 19% of Negro children 3 and 4 years old were enrolled in school, compared to 15% of white children. Forty-five per cent of Negroes 18 and 19 years old were in school, almost the equal of the white proportion of 51%. Negro college enrollment rose 85% between 1964 and 1968, by which time there were 434,000 Negro college students. (The total full-time university population of Great Britain is 200,000).

Educational achievement should not be exaggerated. Only 16% of Negro high school seniors have verbal test scores at or above grade level. But blacks are staying in school.

3. Female-Headed Families

This problem does not get better, it gets worse. In 1969, the proportion of husband-wife families of Negro and other races declined once again, this time to 68.7%. The illegitimacy ratio rose once again, this time to 29.4% of all live births. (The white ratio rose more sharply, but was still only 4.9%.)

Increasingly, the problem of Negro poverty is the problem of the female-headed family. In 1968, 56% of Negro families with income under $3,000 were female-headed. In 1968, for the first time, the number of poor children in female-headed families (2,241,000) was greater than the number in male-headed families (1,947,000).

4. Social Pathology

The incidence of anti-social behavior among young black males continues to be extraordinarily high. Apart from white racial attitudes, this is the biggest problem black Americans face, and in part it helps shape white racial attitudes. Black Americans injure one another. Because blacks live in de facto segregated neighborhoods and go to de facto segregated schools, the socially stable elements of the black population cannot escape the socially pathological ones. Routinely, their children get caught up in the antisocial patterns of the others.

You are familiar with the problem of crime. Let me draw your attention to another phenomenon, exactly parallel, and originating in exactly the same social circumstances: Fire. Unless I mistake the trends, we are heading for a genuinely serious fire problem in American cities. In New York, for example, between 1956 and 1969 the over-all fire alarm rate more than tripled, from 69,000 alarms to 240,000. These alarms are concentrated in slum neighborhoods, primarily black. In 1968, one slum area had an alarm rate per square mile 13 times that of the city as a whole. In another, the number of alarms has, on an average, increased 44% per year for seven years.

Many of these fires are the result of population density. But a great many are more or less deliberately set. (Thus, on Monday, welfare protestors set two fires in the New York state capitol.) Fires are in fact a "leading indicator" of social pathology for a neighborhood. They come first. Crime, and the rest, follows. The psychiatric interpretation of fire-setting is complex, but it relates to the types of personalities which slums produce. (A point of possible interest: Fires in the black slums peak in July and August. The urban riots of 1964-1968 could be thought of as epidemic conditions of an endemic situation.)

5. Social Alienation

With no real evidence, I would nonetheless suggest that a great deal of the crime, the fire-setting, the rampant school violence and other such phenomena in the black community have become quasi-politicized. Hatred—revenge—against whites is now an acceptable excuse for doing what might have been done anyway. This is bad news for any society, especially when it takes forms which the Black Panthers seem to have adopted.

This social alienation among the black lower classes is matched and probably enhanced, by a virulent form of anti-white feeling among portions of the large and prosperous black middle class. It would be difficult to overestimate the degree to which young, well-educated blacks detest white America.

6. The Nixon Administration

As you have candidly acknowledged, the relation of the Administration to the black population is a problem. I think it ought also to be acknowledged that we are a long way from solving it. During the past year, intense efforts have been made by the Administration to develop programs that will be of help to the blacks. I dare say, as much or more time and attention goes into this effort in this Administration than any in history. But little has come of it. There has been a great deal of political ineptness in some departments, and you have been the loser.

I don't know what you can do about this. Perhaps nothing. But I do have four suggestions.

First. Sometime early in the year, I would gather together the Administration officials who are most involved with these matters and talk out the subject a bit. There really is a need for a more coherent Administration approach to a number of issues. (Which I can list for you, if you like.)

Second. The time may have come when the issue of race could benefit from a period of "benign neglect." The subject has been too much talked about. The forum has been too much taken over to hysterics, paranoids and boodlers on all sides. We may need a period in which Negro progress continues and racial rhetoric fades. The Administration can help bring this about by paying close attention to such progress—as we are doing—while seeking to avoid situations in which extremists of either race are given opportunities for martyrdom, heroics, histrionics or whatever. Greater attention to Indians, Mexican-Americans and Puerto Ricans would be useful. A tendency to ignore provocations from groups such as the Black Panthers might also be useful. (The Panthers were apparently almost defunct until the Chicago police raided one of their headquarters and transformed them into culture heroes for the white—and black—middle class. You perhaps did not note on the society page of yesterday's Times that Mrs. Leonard Bernstein gave a cocktail party on Wednesday to raise money for the Panthers. Mrs. Peter Duchin, "the rich blonde wife of the orchestra leader," was thrilled. "I've never met a Panther," she said. "This is a first for me.")

Third. We really ought to be getting on with research on crime. We just don't know enough. It is a year now since the Administration came to office committed to doing something about crime in the streets. But frankly, in that year I don't see that we have advanced either our understanding of the problem, or that of the public at large. (This of course may only reveal my ignorance of what is going on.)

At the risk of indiscretion, may I put it that lawyers are not professionally well-equipped to do much to prevent crime. Lawyers are not managers, and they are not researchers. The logistics, the ecology, the strategy and tactics of reducing the incidence of certain types of behavior in large urban populations simply are not things lawyers think about often.

We are never going to "learn" about crime in a laboratory sense. But we almost certainly could profit from limited, carefully done studies. I don't think these will be done unless you express a personal interest.

Fourth. There is a silent black majority as well as a white one. It is mostly working class, as against lower middle class. It is politically moderate (on issues other than racial equality) and shares most of the concerns of its white counterpart. This group has been generally ignored by the Government and the media. The more recognition we can give to it, the better off we shall all be. (I would take it, for example, that Ambassador [Jerome H.] Holland is a natural leader of this segment of the black community. There are others like him.)

Black Workers and the Labor Movement

By FREDERICK O'NEAL

U.S. Negroes are a working people. The labor movement has been the home of the working man—traditionally the only haven of the dispossessed. And it is in the trade union movement where blacks have both a job to do and a great future.

The black trade unionist can play a creative and essential role in three identifiable areas:

• First, he must be a militant integrationist and an advocate of militant non-violence. As part of an integrated trade union movement, the black worker knows well the folly of separatism. As part of a movement that has won real and concrete gains for black Americans, he knows that frustration politics is merely a form of psycho-therapy which can lead only to a deadend. And he knows that violence will sooner destroy the black community than contribute to its salvation.

• Second, the black worker must articulate a sensible economic strategy as an alternative to the fanatical ideas that are currently gaining popularity in some quarters. Several facts are elementary to this strategy: Black capitalism will not help black workers; tax incentives will only mean more profits for the rich; there is absolutely no land on which to build industry in the ghetto; community control over an impoverished ghetto will be that and only that—it will not provide jobs for the unemployed, homes for the ill-housed, doctors for the sick and better teachers for the uneducated. The black worker must understand that there can be no cure for black poverty in the absence of an attack on white poverty and that the racial problem in America requires an economic solution.

The black worker must now speak out against psychological solutions to economic problems. And he must also speak out against deceptive programs which divert people's attention from the real objectives. Those objectives are full employment, the redistribution of wealth and the reconstruction of our cities.

• Third, the black worker has an enormously significant political role to play. He must continually point out that the source of funds for a genuine war on poverty lies in Washington and that if liberal-thinking men are to be elected to national office, black people must vote. The kind of voter education and registration campaigns that Negro trade unionists carried on in all the major American cities in 1968 must remain a model for similar political activity in the future.

Negroes Need Allies

Negroes represent only 11 percent of the American population. Therefore, Negroes cannot go it alone. Any positive action coming from Washington will come only through a coalition of Negroes, liberals and the entire trade union movement. The black worker must be a forceful spokesman for unity within this coalition and he must speak out firmly against any activities which promote racial polarization. He must become an agent of reconciliation who will break the bitter connection between black rage and white fear. Unity must be re-established between the economically deprived and the economically insecure in their common struggle against the economic elite.

Today there are over 2 million black trade unionists and this number is increasing daily. More Negroes are also moving up through the ranks of their local unions to positions of power and influence. This latter development is particularly essential if there are to be more voices in the trade union movement speaking for the black worker and if the trade union movement itself is to be more effective in its efforts to solve our country's social and racial problems.

Black Workers Suffer Most

Today, despite all the progress we've made, the unemployed are filling our ghettos, the inner cores of our cities are literally rotting, health care is primitive and our schools are ill-equipped to serve the enormous needs of children bred in poverty. And the situation is growing worse daily, for automation is transforming the character of labor. Unskilled jobs are being eliminated, muscle power is no longer in demand and as always, black workers suffer most from these changes.

Over the past 100 years, since Negroes first entered the trade union movement in America, many mistakes have been made. One of the most serious errors was the enforced pattern of segregated unions and the tolerance of segregated jobs in the plant.

Now, from the vantage point of history, we can examine the mistakes of the past and try to correct them. We can learn from the great debates that have taken place within the black community between the separatists and the integrationists, between the economic conservatives and the economic radicals.

A. Philip Randolph has continuously told us that there is no hope for the black workers outside the American trade union movement, that a Negro-labor alliance must be made a firm and enduring reality.

Discrimination and segregation still exist within certain areas of the union movement. There is no attempt here to close our eyes to that situation. Discrimination is there, perhaps less than in many other major American institutions, but it's still there and must be opposed.

But because it exists, we should not take the foolish path of the separatists. We should not employ the distorted logic which says that the existence of discrimination justifies separatism and further segregation.

Alliances between black workers and trade unionists do not always come easily. With just cause the black community is impatient with America—11 years after anti-discriminaiton laws were enacted in New York City, few private apartment buildings are integrated; 15 years after the Supreme Court decision outlawing school segregation, many Negro children still attend all-black schools.

Similarly, the existence of lily-white local unions and separate seniority lines are a source of dissatisfaction on the part of blacks. In fact, if you read only the public accounts, you would be convinced that the relationship between the Negro community and the labor movement is not good at all.

Seeds of Mistrust, Division

And in such an emotion-charged atmsophere one can easily become blinded to the positive efforts and accomplishments of the labor movement in the racial and social areas that are a benefit to us all. There are certain elements, whether consciously or unconsciously, sowing seeds of mistrust and divisiveness in the black community—some of it through misinformation and some through deliberate distortion. As a result, both civil rights forces and the trade unionists often find themselves confused, frustrated and their work seriously hampered.

It is important that we separate fact from fiction, not because the historical record is necessarily so significant, but so that we can stop wasting time and address ourselves to the real problem.

The history of the southern labor movement, for instance, is rich in episodes of black and white workers fighting together—in the coal mines, on the docks, at the plants—all in defiance of community traditions, practice and law.

In the South today the vast majority of union members belong to integrated locals. All the southern state and local central bodies are integrated and most work closely with NAACP branches and other similar organizations in the Negro community. Joint campaigns to register voters and get out the vote are widespread. In labor disputes involving the predominantly black hospital workers in South Carolina, there was a huge outpouring of local support from other unions in the area.

And on the national scene we have seen the unions and the civil rights movement working together to achieve the civil rights legislation of the 1960s—legislation which opened public accommodations, established a federal fair employment practices law and helped enfranchise hundreds of thousands of black voters previously denied that right.

Black Longshoremen Are Opposing Merger

WASH. POST

BALTIMORE, Sept. 30 (AP) —A Negro union official said a merger of black and white locals of the International Longshoremen's Association here and a change in the hiring system would jeopardize the safety and efficiency of dock operations.

William Haile, an international vice president, testified in a federal action seeking a court ruling that the ILA's local setup violates the 1964 Civil Rights Act.

Haile suggested the economy of the port would suffer through the recommended merger of Local 829, which is a predominantly white unit, and Local 858, almost all of whose 1,200 members are black.

Union lawyers sought to establish that Local 829 logs more work hours than its Negro counterpart because its gearmen, mechanics and foremen are hired on what amounts to a weekly basis by stevedore firms.

The number of hours worked by the actual longshore gangs in the two locals was approximately the same, said John Kopp, a district vic president of the ILA.

Through a series of wi nesses, the government sough to demonstrate specific exan ples of discrimination tha have occurred because of th existence of two cargo local that perform the same wor but are essentially segregated

Julius Miller, a union law yer, said he was attempting t demonstrate that the local should not be merged merel because the governmen "wants to bring them to gether." He said there may b economic and social reason for keeping them apart "i they so desire."

"I can't follow that," replie Judge Alexander Harvey I who is hearing the case in U.S District Court.

MORE BLACKS THAN WHITES,
PROPORTIONATELY, IN LABOR UNIONS

WASHINGTON -- More black workers than whites belong to unions in proportion to their representation in the work force.

While this is true for both sexes, black females show greater proportional representation in labor unions than do their white counterparts.

About 14 percent of black females in the labor force are union members, compared with 10 percent of white females.

For union members in general, pay is higher than for non-union workers.

However, in all industries, median earnings of white workers are higher than for blacks. Only full-time, year-round workers are included.

These are some of the findings of the study, Selected Earnings and Demographic Characteristics of Union Members, 1970 (Report 417), a free publication issued recently by the U.S. Department of Labor's Bureau of Labor Statistics.

Among blue collar occupations, which have traditionally been the most highly unionized, a greater proportion of white than black males were in unions. But a greater proportion of black than white females in blue collar occupations were union members.

In white collar jobs, blacks, both male and female, were more likely to be union members than whites.

In describing union membership among blacks and whites by industry, the report said the extent of union organization among black workers exceeded that among whites in most industries.

In the durable goods manufacturing industry, for example, nearly 47 percent of all black wage and salary workers were in unions, compared with 36 percent of white workers.

One factor underlying the $1,553 differential between the median earnings of white and black male union members -- $9,285 and $7,732, respectively -- was the type of blue collar jobs typically held by blacks.

(MORE)

Proportionately, whites were better represented than blacks in the higher-paying craft jobs and were less often in the lower-paying operative positions.

Furthermore, a larger proportion of white than black workers were employed in high-paying professional and technical occupations, and a smaller percentage were in low-paying service occupations.

Other findings of the report included these:

-- In construction, nearly 70 percent of all white male union members were employed as craftsmen; only 45 percent of black union members in construction were craftsmen -- the rest held non-craft jobs.

-- In communications, 75 percent of all white male union members were in high-paying craft occupations, compared with 55 percent of black male union members in that industry.

-- Black workers accounted for over 12 percent of all union members in the work force as a whole.

-- Only 9 percent of all clerical workers were black, but nearly 14 percent of the union members on clerical jobs were black.

-- Nearly 17 percent of union members in public administration were lback, even though only 13 percent of all wage and salary workers in the public sector were black.

Forced Integration and Crime Follow U.S. Aid, Some Say; Key Vote Is Set Tomorrow

11/2/70

By WALTER S. MOSSBERG
Staff Reporter of THE WALL STREET JOURNAL

WARREN, Mich.—This is a flat, grid-like city to which white factory workers have fled over the past 20 years in their quest to escape the crime and grime—and, for some, the Negroes—of Detroit.

In 1950 it had 40,000 residents. Now it has 180,000, most living in well-maintained but closely packed subdivision houses. It has no downtown, just occasional shopping centers and lots of pizza parlors, hamburger stands and neon signs. Many big factories are here, too, so many residents never have to venture into the rest of the world.

And that's apparently fine with most citizens. "People here have a few bucks, and they couldn't care less what goes on (beyond their neighborhoods) as long as they get a beer, some television and a steak once in a while," says Jack Gardner, who runs an auto parts factory.

But now many residents of this Detroit suburb believe the outside world is trying to force itself on their town, on their neighborhoods. They're furious, and they may well vote tomorrow to ban a part of the outside world they particularly fear—the Federal Government and its millions of dollars in proferred aid.

Tomorrow's vote will be on a referendum that would repeal Warren's urban renewal program, which is designed to refurbish the older areas of Warren that are getting seedy. Repeal would cut off $3 million in Federal funds earmarked for the city for this year, and up to $5.5 million more expected to be received by 1976.

The statement on the ballot is clear, but the issue here is somewhat muddled. Opponents of the Federal aid talk of Federal "strings" that threaten—or seem to threaten—the kind of living Warren residents thought they had found when they moved to the suburbs. In some instances this resentment stems from fears that Federal dollars bring a shift of "control" from locally elected officials to bureaucrats appointed by Washington. Other voters see Federal aid bringing forced integration. Still others say they wouldn't mind the integration—but they fear school deterioration, crime and other social ills that they think would accompany integration.

Boos for Mr. Romney

Other voters see Federal aid bringing forced integration. Still others say they wouldn't mind the integration—but they fear school deterioration, crime and other social ills that they think would accompany integration.

Boos for Mr. Romney

Never before has this city been so wrought up. The money would come from the Department of Housing and Urban Development, and last summer when HUD Secretary and former Michigan Gov. George Romney came here to talk to Warren officials he was hooted and booed by 300 to 400 angry demonstrators. When he left, they screamed and yelled at him and thumped on his car. Orville Hubbard, an avowed segregationist who is mayor of the Detroit suburb of Dearborn, was also at the meeting, and when he left he was cheered.

There are no scientific samplings of opinion on how the people here will vote tomorrow or on how many of the 75,000 registered voters will show up at the polls. But a local councilman, who favors retaining the urban renewal program, thinks Warren was ten-to-one against renewal in September when emotions were running high and was still two-to-one against it as recently as two weeks ago.

The outcome will tell a lot about the workingman's mind in 1970. Few towns are as single-class as this one, and few issues in the country are as emotional as the one here has become. The vote will provide another clue to the extent of conservatism among blue-collar workers, political observers say. More important, observers say, the vote will indicate the degree of difficulty the Federal Government will have in coming years as the focus of urban renewal shifts from center cities to middle-class and lower-class suburbs.

The outcome in Warren "certainly could have an impact on other communities," Secretary Romney says. He says the opposition here "raises the question of whether other cities are willing to qualify for funds by meeting HUD requirements."

The main requirement is a demonstration of "affirmative" action toward integration, and thus one vote here is often interpreted as a clear-cut referendum on the white workingman's feelings about integration. Indeed, 17% of the voters here cast their ballots for George Wallace in the 1968 Presidential election, which suggests there is some racism here. No one admits to being anti-Negro, but some of their comments suggest otherwise.

Threatening a "Way of Life"

But most residents here vehemently insist the issue isn't race. "It's the whole resentment of people to the arrogance of Government," says Robert Lord, a lawyer working against urban renewal. "People here don't like to be told that . . . they have to change their way of living."

"Way of living" seem to be the key words in his assessment. The people here don't want the way of life that Detroit has, and they fear that's what urban renewal would bring. "I had a niece who lived in the city, 13 years old, and she was almost raped, shot in the back there. Who is going to guarantee me the same things won't happen to my daughter here if we vote for this urban renewal program?" asks Henry Wengrzynowicz, a salesman who thinks urban renewal will bring blacks to Warren.

Many residents here have invested their life savings in their $20,000 to $30,000 homes, and they fear the effect of urban renewal on their investments. "It wouldn't make any difference to me to have a colored neighbor, but my property value would go way down because there are a lot of narrow-minded people who think this is a white country," says a young merchant.

Ann Sheldon, a sociologist at Wayne State University, in Detroit, agrees that the fears of the people here aren't based entirely on racism. "People in Warren are acting on the most real evidence they have—the evidence of conditions in Detroit where property loses value and schools decline because, they believe, the blacks have moved in. You can't read racist motives into all of these reactions."

Nor can you read racist motives directly into the most often heard argument cited here: That the Federal money should be rejected because of the chance that local residents would lose control of their town. Cynics suggest this is the main public argument because it is the least offensive to the pro-renewal forces, but, whatever the reason, many residents keep repeating it.

"If someone is going to tell you how to run your city, you haven't got a city," says Jim Brown, a young barber. "I don't want it, not if there's going to be strings. Anytime you get anything with strings attached, it's bad. I don't have anything against the colored. If they can afford to move next door to me, that's fine. But I'm against money with strings."

Similarly, Jim Alexander, a printer, says: "I'm not too crazy about Federal money. I'd rather be more independent. Too many people look to the Federal Government, and they put strings on the money—how you can use it, who you can employ and other rules."

But people are vague about just what the "strings" are. The only demands so far seem to be that Warren keep its weak fair-housing law and its "community board," a human relations group. This is enough to show an "affirmative" attitude toward integration, HUD officials insist.

Almost lost in the controversy is the debate over whether the seedier areas of Warren are in need of rehabilitation and whether the people who live in these areas want urban renewal. There's no question that parts of the city are drab and rundown, but whether these old house should be refurbished or torn down under Federal supervision is a matter of dispute. The anti-renewal forces say a little locally inspired fixing up is all that's needed. The pro-renewal forces disagree. Likewise, each side claims support of the people in the area.

Richard Sabaugh, a city councilman who opposes renewal, insists Warren has no "blighted" areas. He says he would move into the city's older section himself if he could find "the right house." In Washington a HUD official says such attitudes are common when renewal programs are proposed. "A place that is feeling the effects of blight for the first time is naturally reluctant to admit it," he says. "Nobody likes to be living in what is considered a blighted area."

HUD has already spent $1.4 million here since urban renewal began a couple of years ago. The money has gone to renovate some older homes and to tear down a few others, but many anti-renewal people here think it was misused. They think too much of the money went into staffing and administering the program. But HUD officials claim that high administrative costs are normal for the start of a program and that a far smaller percentage of future funds would go toward administrative expenses.

But when all arguments are dissected, the issue still comes down to this: Will urban renewal turn Warren into a city like Detroit? Anti-renewal forces think it will. As Mr. Lord, the anti-renewal lawyer says, the most important thing to many people in Warren is just the simple fact that it isn't Detroit.

Newark signs up a business team

The friendship between Newark's historically aloof business community and Mayor Kenneth Gibson, on the job only 45 days, is flourishing. This week, as the 48-year-old black mayor told about a new industrial facility that could ultimately bring 8,000 jobs into town, six prominent local businessmen on loan to city hall were trying to unravel the tangle of city finances and introduce better management of city services.

Both developments hold considerable promise for Newark, a city plagued by official corruption, the scars of racial confrontation, and an emasculated tax base. The new plant, to be built by Ideal Toy Corp. on the Meadowlands, a 1,500-acre chunk of underdeveloped land, will be the biggest to locate in New Jersey's largest city since World War II. Its 600,000 sq.-ft. first phase, to be completed in early 1972, will employ about 1,700 people, mostly in the unskilled category, where Newark's need is greatest. Gibson figures the city has lost at least 10,000 manufacturing jobs in the past decade. But just as important, Ideal will pay the city $33,000 for each of its first 38 acres and roughly $160,000 a year in real estate taxes. Gibson pledged early in his campaign against incumbent Hugh Addonizio to stabilize the city's escalating tax rate, one of the highest in the nation at $8.44 per $100 of assessed valuation.

Unique effort. While Gibson needs every cent he can raise locally or cajole out of Washington and Trenton, "his biggest problem so far has been to gain control of the city machinery," says Charles G. Hall, president of the Greater Newark Chamber of Commerce. To meet that challenge, the mayor has imported into city hall a half-dozen businessmen—each on loan for 90 days—in an exercise of private-public cooperation foreign to most big cities and unheard of in Newark. The team comes from the cream of the city's business establishment: Prudential Insurance Co., National Newark & Essex Bank, Fidelity Union Trust Co., New Jersey Bell Telephone, Public Service Gas & Electric Co.

These advisers could scarcely believe what they found. "I was almost in a state of shock for the two weeks," exclaims Robert Smith, a Pru vice-president who oversees the other businessmen as Gibson's interim business administrator. Contracts to provide services to the city—towing of cars off city streets, for instance—had expired with no arrangements made for renewal. The city was in noncompliance on several state and federal aid programs and grants were being canceled. Cost overruns on public works jobs were rampant. By some estimates, Newark missed out on $10-million in federal aid last year, simply because the city administration didn't know the money was available.

Smith, who had only 48 hours' notice before taking the city job, and his associates have tried to attend to such pressing matters immediately. But, as one businessman puts it, "it'll take at least a year for Gibson and anyone he has helping him to straighten out the mess at city hall." ■

A REPORT FROM THE URBAN INSTITUTE

Public School Financing

Seeking ways to get more revenue and more equitable distribution

Twin problems facing more and more of America's public school systems are the provision of adequate levels of financing and the assuring of equal educational opportunity for all children. The first of these makes more difficult the resolution of the second.

Schools rely heavily on revenues from property taxation, yet property owners increasingly resist further taxation. Because children from disadvantaged families often are concentrated in areas where property values are declining, resources tend to be least adequate where educational problems are greatest. Moreover, most state systems of financial aid to education are not geared to overcoming these local fiscal imbalances.

The scope of the financing crisis and an analysis of possible solutions are the focus of a group of researchers, headed by Betsy Levin. They are documenting the way state and local governments raise money to pay for education and how the funds are spent. Those data will form the basics of a computer model which analysts can use to determine the effects of alternate methods of raising revenue and of distributing funds to school districts and specific schools.

A study is being made of seven states, four of which have historically provided a high percentage of state aid to elementary and secondary education. Relationships between school districts' expenditures and such factors as personal income, racial composition and teacher characteristics will be examined.

What is learned from these studies will be the basis for seeking ways in which the tax burdens and distribution of aid may be arranged more equitably.

Analysts believe use of the computer model will enable them to answer questions such as these: What would happen if a state-wide sales tax were used to finance education instead of a local property levy? If a state did shift to a sales tax scheme, which income groups would pay most? How would an existing state aid pattern be altered if funds were distributed on the basis of school district per capita income differentials?

The Institute is working closely with the President's Commission on School Finance and is briefing the Commission on the analysis and preliminary findings. The group plans eventually to assess the feasibility of making specific improvements in school financing at the state level. □

Whitney M. Young, Jr.

On behalf of the Institute's Board of Trustees, John W. Gardner wrote the following tribute to the late Whitney M. Young, Jr., who served as a Trustee from the Institute's inception until his death in Nigeria in March:

> Whitney Young had qualities necessary to every great leader—enormous physical vitality, an unshakable sense of direction and the capacity to withstand criticism from his friends as well as his opponents. During years of great tension and conflict for his people and his nation, he was a rock of strength and steadiness.

Godzilla and Slippery Water

Technology to the aid of cities that use outmoded hardware

While the great urban social and political issues such as poverty, race and taxes are debated and headlined, cities go plodding along with their prosaic, unglamorous, every-day jobs. Cleaning streets. Fighting fires. Maintaining parks and buildings. Inspecting and licensing. Trying to untangle traffic jams.

Could not existing technology—inventions and hardware already developed for manufacturing, defense or space—be harnessed to help cities provide better services at significant cost savings?

In a symposium cosponsored by the Institute with the International City Management Association and the National Science Foundation, the participants determined that in many cases the answer is "yes." They also agreed that a major benefit of using technology to modernize city operations would be the freeing of substantial funds—even billions of dollars—for use in social programs.

A report inspired by the symposium, The Struggle To Bring Technology To Cities, details the obstacles that have kept local officials, industry and the scientist-technicians from working together to take advantage of the applied technology opportunities. But it also gives an account of two success stories to illustrate the potential benefits that may be attained.

Scottsdale, Arizona, taking a careful look at trash and garbage collection, discovered that a major cost was in the individual handling and hand-emptying of containers at private homes. Officials sold the residents on using larger containers that might be shared by several families, and designed them so they could be raised, emptied and set back in place by a mechanized loader. Unable to obtain help from industry, the city found local people to

Utilities Technology Assessment

Total energy plants studied as possible housing breakthrough

"Operation Breakthrough" was conceived by the Department of Housing and Urban Development to promote modern production techniques in housing. HUD looked beyond housing itself to question whether breakthroughs could occur in utility systems and invited developers to produce innovative prototype projects.

The Urban Institute was asked to investigate these as a first step toward a systematic technology assessment of any which merited it. A preliminary study headed by Kenneth Webb found that a "total energy system" appears to offer considerable potential. In this system, on-site generators supply electricity to residential or commercial complexes. Normally wasted heat is captured, supplemented by auxiliary burners and used to produce space heat, air conditioning and hot water. In conventional installations, additional fuel must be used for heating and cooling purposes.

On the plus side, the heat transfer principle of total energy systems results in fuel savings. If widely used, the systems could lower air pollution since they use cleaner fuels than the coal-burning power plants. They would take some strain off overloaded electric networks and eliminate the need for lines to the site.

Investment costs in times of high interest rates, however, may boost tenant utility payments 15 percent or more. Since the total energy plants would be on site and not part of a regulated public utility, the question of establishing fair rates poses other difficulties.

To assess whether total energy plants may be a "breakthrough" in housing utilities technology, the Institute proposes that about ten of them be compared with conventional utility systems on the basis of performance, reliability, costs, pollution, noise, vibration and esthetics. Further, effects on tenants, owners, developers and communities should be surveyed from a socio-ecological and an economic viewpoint. □

Security and Housing

Apartment dwellers increasingly concerned about safety features

The crime problem has special implications for housing management that are seldom considered, according to Margaret J. Drury who has been investigating the problem of providing security in multi-family dwellings.

Increased anxiety over the safety of life and property has caused people to place a high priority on management services involving security. A general proposition of the Institute's housing management research effort is that housing is more than a physical structure. It is the provision of a whole bundle of housing services. To determine how well the housing inventory is serving requires an analysis of tangible services like heat, hot water and maintenance and intangible services like quiet, privacy and assurance of security.

It appears obvious that more effective security at lower cost may be obtained by considering resident safety in the original site and building design. Yet this is frequently ignored. Poor locks and doors, dimly lit halls and stairwell "blind spots" may invite crime. Exterior lighting, layout and landscaping similarly may promote crime because of poor planning. Often, after security provisions are made in the original plans, these are deleted to cut costs.

This study of housing security raises many questions. For instance: Why should a single-family home dweller receive the benefit of patrol surveillance along the access route to his home—the street—when the apartment dweller finds the access to his dwelling unit—the hall—rarely if ever protected by the police? This question poses difficult practical and legal issues for local officials as well as for private and public housing management.

The Institute study is directed at formulating what can be done by owners, managers, residents, tenant groups, public agencies, builders, architects and policy makers to minimize the dangers and fears associated with crime where people live. □

Surveys for Local Government

Institute staff evaluating experiment in Dayton, Ohio area

Presidents are said to carry opinion research results around in their pockets; giant corporations base major marketing and manufacturing decisions on consumer preference polls; attitude surveys influence styles, political campaigns and diplomacy. Can sample surveys also help government decision-makers?

The Public Opinion Center in the Dayton metropolitan area, sponsored by the Kettering Foundation, recently launched a local citizen survey operation that is uniquely focused on one metropolitan area to test its usefulness.

The Urban Institute has been asked to advise and assess this experiment. Kenneth Webb, assisted by Harry P. Hatry, Joseph S. Wholey and Donald M. Fisk, will evaluate the survey effort during a year-long period.

They will assess the center according to two main criteria: 1) Does the survey operation help local officials devise better policies and programs? 2) Does citizen surveying improve the citizens' sense of participation in local government?

One concern is that the surveys not be

Blacks and Whites: Measuring the Changes

Status of blacks during past decade analyzed

The civil rights legislation and visible changes in social conditions during the 1960's make it one of the most significant decades in America's racial history.

Measuring and interpreting the significance of the changes during the past decade is a challenge, however, to the general public and to researchers. Developing reliable yardsticks—racial indicators—to show where black Americans stood in comparison with white Americans and where both seem to be going is a major research commitment at The Urban Institute.

The Institute's Indicators program, led by Harvey A. Garn, undertook to collect and display available social and economic measurements that would give a balanced picture of the status of blacks and whites in the 1960-68 period. The result this summer was, Blacks and Whites. An Experiment in Racial Indicators, prepared by Michael J. Flax. In his foreword to this 79-page publication, Institute President William Gorham says, "These indicators and the explanations of them provide some reference points for improving the quality of the public and private interpretation, understanding and discussion of racial issues."

Racial data have been compiled in the past, including The Social and Economic Status of Negroes in the United States, published by the Census and the Bureau of Labor Statistics. While relying heavily on these data, the Institute study is unique because of its use and presentation of the material.

Flax provides several alternative views of the available figures in 16 areas of social and economic activity, and also attempts to interpret recent research for the general audience. First, he examines the data to determine whether blacks and whites, viewed separately, made progress in the 1960's. Second, he compares progress toward racial equality in both relative and absolute terms. Third, he shows some of the possible implications of a continuation of the 1960-68 trends into the near future. In a later chapter, Garn discusses how recent research findings explain present and future relationships between income and other social and economic factors.

As the summary table on pages 4-5 shows, the 16 indicators used in the study are grouped in six categories. Twenty-six further tables in the publication present the specific data backing up the summary findings.

The second major question asked in the summary—Are nonwhites catching up to whites?—illustrates the complexity of the current racial picture. Specifically, are nonwhites improving at a faster rate than whites (a relative measurement), and is the gap between whites and nonwhites getting smaller (an absolute measurement)? In many instances, Flax found that the relative and absolute answers point in different directions. He therefore warns readers of racial indicators that "the progress of nonwhites can sometimes be made to look good or poor depending upon how the data are used."

The median family income indicator serves as an example of this phenomenon of catching up relatively while falling behind. Nonwhite income increased at a faster rate than white—4.9 percent compared to 3.4 percent. But at

Five-Year Budget for SRS

Massive social program being subjected to intensive review

With the advantage of hindsight, it now seems evident that realistic projections of the costs and effects of the medical aid program enacted by Congress in 1965 for recipients of public assistance could have averted the bottlenecks and cutbacks experienced by Medicaid in recent years.

To help avoid similar problems in future social service programs, The Urban Institute has been asked to assist the Social and Rehabilitation Services (SRS) in the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare in planning and analysis. The first step will be to help develop a five-year budget and analysis system for the years 1974 through 1978. Once pressures for immediate planning needs are relieved, efforts will focus on isolating and analyzing future priority issues for SRS.

Robert Harris heads the new Institute project with a staff of seven professionals and six consultants. Harris was formerly Deputy Administrator of New York City's Health Services Administration and Executive Director of the President's Commission on Income Maintenance Programs. The Institute staff is working closely with the SRS internal planning unit and with staffs of SRS's operating bureaus.

SRS is responsible for the direction of programs of Public Assistance, Medicaid, Community Services, and Rehabilitation Services. In addition it contains the Administration on Aging and the Youth Development and Delinquency Prevention Agency. It has the third largest federal governmental budget, exceeded only by the Department of Defense and the Social Security Administration. Its programs expend over $20 billion annually, of which $14 billion are federal funds and the remainder state-local matching funds.

To help achieve maximum public benefits with these expenditures, the Institute is assisting SRS in the definition of the agency's goals, measuring agency activities against those goals, and determining whether alternative activities might be more effective or more economical.

Harris explains that a characteristic of many social programs is that the cost patterns change considerably over time. Understanding these cost growth patterns can be a key to developing sensible current decisions and programs that do not bring in their wake new sets of social problems. □

Urban Indicators Updated

Conditions, rates of change in 18 metro areas compared

"A study in Comparative Urban Indicators: Conditions in 18 Metropolitan Areas," is an expanded and updated version of The Urban Institute's earlier 1970 comparison of "quality of life" indicators in the same areas. The newly released report, by Michael J. Flax, invites another look at the question: How can we properly measure the quality of urban life?

The 18 areas examined are New York City, Los Angeles, Chicago, Philadelphia, Detroit, San Francisco, Boston, Washington, Pittsburgh, St. Louis, Baltimore, Cleveland, Houston, Minneapolis-St. Paul, Dallas, Milwaukee, Cincinnati, and Buffalo.

Despite the large quantities of urban data currently collected and released, these are seldom gathered, arranged, and presented so that a citizen or official can obtain quantitative estimates of the conditions in his area and how such conditions compare with other metropolitan areas. To help ameliorate this situation,

Price Tags on City Services

Equity, pollution, efficiency, revenue aspects examined

What kinds of public services or public products can be "priced"?

Should local governments consider "selling" more of their services?

How are municipal operations and city-suburb transactions affected by the way a city raises its revenues?

These are among the difficult questions that are examined critically in an Urban Institute study, Public Prices for Public Products, edited by Selma J. Mushkin. Dr. Mushkin, formerly Director of State-Local Finance Studies at the Institute, and 21 other authors examine both the economic theories and practical applications of user charges and fees in an urban setting.

Concerns about property taxation today spur interest in alternative approaches. Some of the major reasons why a local government should, in certain cases, turn from financing through general taxation to the pricing of its services are:

—Conservation. Services offered by governments without charge, as if they were free goods, tend to be wasted or abused. Pricing scarce resources such as water supplies becomes an inducement to use them sparingly. Further, putting charges on measurable units of waste discharges that now are polluting air, water, and land create financial incentives for citizens and firms to minimize the harm they do.

—Equity. Citizens who use specific facilities or services—such as a municipal airport, warehouse, or golf course—then pay most or all of the cost. Those who do not use the services are not forced to subsidize who reap the direct benefits.

—Economic efficiency. Economists

Forecasting City Spending

Model developed as tool for budgeting, planning

Many cities find themselves unable to provide acceptable public services because their estimates of future spending prove to be wide of the mark.

To improve methods of projecting expenditures, Claudia Scott of The Urban Institute has developed a forecasting model for use by local government managers, planners, and budget officers.

Concerned not only with theories but also with real situations, Dr. Scott developed a model for actual use by the city of New Haven. It contains formulas for predicting personnel and non-personnel expenditures annually for a five-year period for the city's many public services. The usefulness of this new forecasting framework has been demonstrated in that recent data on actual budgeted expenditures for the city fell well within the bounds of the forecasts provided by the model. Forecasts made with methods commonly used by cities (essentially, by projecting observed spending trends) substantially underestimated New Haven's budgets.

The model allows for specific assumptions regarding the size and composition of local population, salaries, and service levels to influence the projections. The projections can take account of changes in unionization which affect the wage demands of local government employees and thus influence future expenditures. This projection method can help administrators by giving them different sets of forecasts, depending on whether service levels are to be maintained, decreased, or increased.

New Haven provides a wide range of municipal services. These include education, which in other parts of the country is more typically the responsibility of an independent school district, and welfare service, which is usually a county government function. Because the model is built around a large variety of independent expenditure functions, this example may readily be applied by other local governments—cities, counties, or special districts. To adapt the model to their own situation, officials would simply select those parts which are appropriate to their jurisdictions.

The Urban Institute is publishing Dr. Scott's work, Forecasting Local Government Spending, in cooperation with the Municipal Finance Officers Association of the United States and Canada. The book provides officials who have little time or technical background an overview of the approach and uses of the forecasting model. At the same time, detailed formulas and explanations are included for technicians who may be interested in adapting the model for use in their areas. □

Poorer Streets for Blacks

Catch-up paving action promised after study confirms inequities

Streets serving black residents in Fairfax County, Virginia, are poorer on the average than those serving white residents of the county, it was determined by an analysis of The Urban Institute's Public Interest Research Project (PIRP).

The study was undertaken to provide objective information in connection with a court case filed against the county and the Virginia State Highway Commission by black residents and four civic associations in August 1971.

The PIRP findings were presented to the judge in the case, and to the attorneys for the plaintiffs and defendants on May 23. On June 1 (the day the trial was to begin), Fairfax County and the state highway agency settled out of court with an agreement to spend about $1 million over a three-year period to improve rutted and unpaved roads in black neighborhoods. The town of Herndon, Virginia, named in the original suit, previously had agreed out of court to pave the one street at issue in its jurisdiction.

William Silverman, PIRP director, said that the method for comparing road quality will be written up as a model for similar cases which follow from the major precedent case, Hawkins v. Town of Shaw. A system was devised for selecting a random sample of streets in white residential areas to compare with those in black areas. Then a roughometer, a device used to provide an electronic record of road surface quality, was towed along the test streets.

In a second and more extensive study, these mechanical records are being calibrated against the "comfort perceptions" of a panel of blindfolded riders who, without being given clues about the character of the neighborhoods through which they were driven, rated the pavement for comfort and smoothness.

Detailed statistical analysis is being employed in this second study to determine whether road quality is related to neighborhood factors other than race, such as population density, housing values, and extent of home ownership. Primary researchers on the study are Andrew J. Boots, III, Grace Dawson, Harry P. Hatry, and Richard Winnie. □

Health Care Costs, Benefits

System for estimating impacts of national schemes developed

The check on health legislation after passage of Medicare and Medicaid was short-lived. Medicare offered no real protection against personal health catastrophes. Medicaid led to serious inequities between recipients as states adopted widely different standards for coverage and eligibility. And both, unexpectedly, had highly inflationary impacts on medical costs.

As a result, 14 major health bills were introduced in the Ninety-Second Congress alone. Their differences reveal a fundamental conflict: should government extend health care to all citizens as a basic right, or should it provide care only to limited groups such as the indigent and aged, with possibly some incentives for others to buy their own insurance?

The degree of government involvement is a matter of political philosophy. The rationality of legislative choice among health care alternatives, however, may be improved by economic analysis. Studies by Gail Wilensky and John Holahan of The Urban Institute aim to meet this prelegislative need for analysis and projection.

Using recent data on frequency, costs, and types of medical service, matched against census data on income levels, family size, race, urban or rural residence, and other demographic characteristics, Wilensky and Holahan estimate health care costs and benefits for five hypothetical national health insurance plans. These plans vary according to a broad range of deductibles (the amounts individuals must pay before coverage begins, as in car insurance) and coinsurance rates (percentages of the bill paid by individuals, as in company group plans). The plans also are analyzed using several financing schemes—flat-rate variable premiums, employment taxes, personal income taxes, and general fund financing.

Benefits of various schemes depend in part on how different categories of the population make use of hospitalization and physician office visits. Hospital use is found to increase with the age of the head of the family, urban residence, income level, and the level of insurance coverage;

Study of CDCs Launched

Minority enterprise, community development effects appraised

Since their origin in the 1960's community development corporations (CDCs) have been created for the purposes of improving conditions in minority neighborhoods, increasing the economic strength of the poor, and fostering minority enterprise. There are now about 80 CDCs in the nation—mostly in the larger cities—which are involved in a wide variety of activities ranging from the rehabilitation and development of housing to the operation of day care centers and cable television programming. Public agencies and private foundations have been instrumental in launching and supporting CDCs.

The Urban Institute has begun a two-year study of CDCs. The first six-month phase of this effort, now in progress, is aimed at learning whether sophisticated, quantitative measures of achievement can be developed for CDCs, given their broad functions. Persons associated with CDCs, as well as researchers, will help determine whether such measures will provide significant and useful insights. Assuming that this type of measurement of success proves feasible, analysts would proceed to evaluate a number of specific CDCs.

This research, due to be completed in mid-1973, is funded by the Ford Foundation and is being conducted by a group of researchers under the direction of Harvey A. Garn. □

Manpower Studies Analyzed

No basis for comparing national programs; project focus urged

Although there have been many benefit-cost analyses of national manpower programs, their findings do not constitute a sound basis for Congressional and executive decisions about these programs at this time.

This disappointing inconclusiveness of almost two dozen past studies stems largely from three major problems. First, methodological limitations are reflected in poor sampling design, inadequate data collection, and conflicting assumptions about benefits and costs. Second, the performance of local projects within national programs often vary so much as to make comparisons among national programs meaningless. Third, allowances are not made for the programs' very different target groups and purposes.

The national programs subjected to this research included Job Corps, the Concentrated Employment Program, the Institutional and On-the-Job Training Programs of the Manpower Development and Training Administration, Job Opportunities in the Business Sector, and (to a limited extent) the Welfare Incentive Program and Neighborhood Youth Corps.

At the request of the Joint Economic Committee of Congress, Joe N. Nay, John W. Scanlon, and Joseph S. Wholey of the Institute undertook a synthesis of benefit-cost studies conducted over the past several years on national manpower programs. Their study is being published later this year in a JEC compendium entitled Benefit-Cost Analyses of Federal Programs, and the single study is available as an Urban Institute paper.

To help Congress conduct its legislative review of manpower programs, the researchers make the following recommendations:

Job Training Program Set with Urban League

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO and the National Urban League will join in a cooperative movement to enhance job and promotion opportunities for Negroes, Federation Pres. George Meany announced here.

The program was approved by the AFL-CIO Executive Council, which voted $10,000 a year for three years to help launch it after an appearance before the council by Whitney M. Young, Jr., executive director of the league.

Meany at a press conference termed the Urban League approach "very positive" and a "good program" in terms of pre-apprenticeship training for Negro youths and job promotions for Negro workers.

He said the AFL-CIO is "not satisfied" that discrimination is being eradicated at all levels of the trade union movement as quickly as desired, but stressed that "constant improvement" and progress are being made. Complete elimination will take time, he noted, and the AFL-CIO will continue to press for results.

Voicing support for the AFL-CIO's civil rights program, Young told the council that "we both recognize" that unfortunately there still remain "many gaps between the stated policies of the AFL-CIO and the practices of some local unions."

The great increase in the number of Negro union members, Young said, "is due to their growing awareness of the advantages to be gained from such membership." Working with the unions, the league "will encourage more active participation of non-white workers in unions and community activities." It is "imperative," he added, "that minority youth be assisted in making early vocational choices" based upon first-hand knowledge of the requirements necessary to enter into apprenticeships and into technical and other occupations."

The League program, in cooperation with the AFL-CIO, will:

- Set up programs to improve the position of Negro workers "in those occupations, industries and business enterprises" which have union contracts.
- Disseminate within the Negro community information on job prospects in the blue-collar labor market, the nature of unions and the rights and responsibilities of union membership.
- Establish a national trade union advisory committee within the urban league to further the cooperative relationship for job opportunities in organized skilled trades and assist in the placement of qualified individuals in job categories where their skills can be fully utilized.

Young told reporters at a press conference he hopes the program will open a "new era of cooperation" between the labor movement and the Negro community, because the condition of the Negro worker today is little different than it was five or 10 years ago.

With unions opening doors to Negroes in greater numbers, he said, the challenge to Negro groups is to provide men who can take advantage of the opportunity.

Dear Mr. Via:

I am sure that you, as a member of Local 189, American Federation of Teachers, AFL-CIO, would like to know about the Labor Education Advancement Program (LEAP) of the National Urban League and its affiliates.

I have therefore enclosed some informational material on our program and its objectives. As you will note, we are operating with the support of a National Trade Union Advisory Committee consisting of Representatives drawn from the AFL-CIO.

You will also note that there is an Urban League LEAP Representative in your region, who works specifically on this project.

I hope that you will see ways in which we can work together to attain common objectives of organized labor and minority group citizens.

Sincerely,

PROGRAM EMPHASIS

The main target areas of Project LEAP are threefold:

1. To develop pre-apprenticeship programs for selected occupations in several Urban League cities. Such a program of this nature will be concerned with the dynamics of disadvantaged Negro youth involving the utilization of union members to carry out the instruction, emphasizing the actual demands and pre-requisites necessary to enter into the apprenticeship program.

   The key in this area of concern is to persuade Negro youths to actively identify and associate themselves with the preparation for adulthood with serious intent and involvement. Such motivating influences will be symbols of communications depicting them and their role in the future by developing materials in visual and print media and employing techniques in group dynamics. This will be in connection with international unions and coordinating the efforts of local league affiliates. Moreover, the National Urban League will promote interest in this project at the local level via print and broadcast media, arranging personal appearances and oral presentations at community affairs and organizing union visitations and plant tours. This last aspect is seen as a dual purpose in providing Negro youths with first hand knowledge of prerequisites necessary to enter into the various trade occupations and also to bring labor and management closer to the Negro community.

2. To develop programs for the minority trade unionists, emphasizing their leadership role and liaison within the trade union movement. Included would be specific programs designed to depict their role and the labor movements' responsibility to community affairs.

3. To have the National Urban League establish and maintain the same kind of dialogue with the labor movement as it has with commerce and industry. This will mean establishing a Trade Union Advisory Council to coordinate this project, providing staff services to affiliates and actively participating in international union conventions, conferences, work-shops and other existing programs.

PURPOSE

Little has been done to bring to the attention of Negro youth and their parents, any realistic information regarding entrance qualifications in the apprenticeable trades. Employers and trade unions who are accelerating the pace of recruitment and acceptance of minority groups do not understand why the response by Negro youth is either minimal or non-existent. This is attributable to the lack of information about and understanding of what the requirements are in terms of educational background and skill level that are necessary to take advantage of such opportunities.

This means that attitudinal changes must be made within the Negro family, as well as within local unions to motivate non-white youths to make early career choices based upon first hand requisites necessary to enter into such occupations. Simultaneously, Project LEAP will provide orientation for non-white trade union members to assume leadership roles within local and international unions.

Project LEAP's purpose will be to provide Negroes with jobs so that they can reach an acceptable level of living in this country. Despite the Negro's will to succeed, barriers to opportunity are the problem and its solution appears to depend on economic growth and employment opportunities, to which the nation is committed.

OBJECTIVES

The objectives of this program will be within the context of already established goals and policies of the National Urban League's Job Development and Employment programs - specifically On-The-Job-Training and National Skills Bank operations - are as follows:

1. To provide a background for non-white union members on their re-responsibility to the furtherance of the trade union movement.

2. To provide union members with community information and identification of their responsibility to the total community.

3. To provide for minority group youth, information and program activity which could lead to selected apprenticeable trades.

4. To facilitate the entrance of Negro youth into the trade union movement with the assistance and participation of local and international unions.

5. To establish dialogue and improve communications between the Negro community and representatives of organized labor.

6. Develop and disseminate information within the Negor community concerning blue-collar employment prospects, interpretation of the role of labor unions, membership requirements, etc.

7. To provide a realistic basis for expanding occupational and guidance counselling services in the predominantly Negro vocational and technical high schools.

8. To work directly with unions to eliminate discriminatory employment practices.

9. To provide employers with new and increased sources of manpower.

Dear Dr. Via:

By now, I hope you have had an opportunity to review the summary of our Labor Education Advancement Program which I forwarded to you several days ago.

This comes as a follow-up of the expressed plans to convene a meeting of community leaders to discuss and formulate appropriate steps of operation for LEAP.

The meeting will be held Thursday, June 2, 1966 at 2:00 p.m. in the conference room of the Southern Regional Office, National Urban League.

We look forward to seeing you at that time and thank you for your cooperation and participation.

Sincerely yours,

Dear Emory:

By now you have my letter of May 23, 1966 advising you of my plans to convene a meeting of community leaders to introduce and explore methods of operation for our Labor Education Advancement Program. Prior to this meeting, I would like an opportunity to discuss with you in person some of the factors that I feel need clarification and probing.

In my conference with Mr. W. A. Montague, Georgia State President, AFL-CIO, he mentioned inviting me to the forthcoming meeting with you and union education representatives. Please remember me in scheduling as I certainly view this as an excellent opportunity to introduce my program.

As always, I welcome any suggestions, comments or ideas from you.

Job Training Program Set with Urban League

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO and the National Urban League will join in a cooperative movement to enhance job and promotion opportunities for Negroes, Federation Pres. George Meany announced here.

The program was approved by the AFL-CIO Executive Council, which voted $10,000 a year for three years to help launch it after an appearance before the council by Whitney M. Young, Jr., executive director of the league.

Meany at a press conference termed the Urban League approach "very positive" and a "good program" in terms of pre-apprenticeship training for Negro youths and job promotions for Negro workers.

He said the AFL-CIO is "not satisfied" that discrimination is being eradicated at all levels of the trade union movement as quickly as desired, but stressed that "constant improvement" and progress are being made. Complete elimination will take time, he noted, and the AFL-CIO will continue to press for results.

Voicing support for the AFL-CIO's civil rights program, Young told the council that "we both recognize" that unfortunately there still remain "many gaps between the stated policies of the AFL-CIO and the practices of some local unions."

The great increase in the number of Negro union members, Young said, "is due to their growing awareness of the advantages to be gained from such membership." Working with the unions, the league "will encourage more active participation of non-white workers in unions and community activities." It is "imperative," he added, "that minority youth be assisted in making early vocational choices" based upon first-hand knowledge of the requirements necessary to enter into

TrainingPlan Set by Labor, UrbanLeague

apprenticeships and into technical and other occupations."

The League program, in cooperation with the AFL-CIO, will:

- Set up programs to improve the position of Negro workers "in those occupations, industries and business enterprises" which have union contracts.
- Disseminate within the Negro community information on job prospects in the blue-collar labor market, the nature of unions and the rights and responsibilities of union membership.
- Establish a national trade union advisory committee within the urban league to further the cooperative relationship for job opportunities in organized skilled trades and assist in the placement of qualified individuals in job categories where their skills can be fully utilized.

Young told reporters at a press conference he hopes the program will open a "new era of cooperation" between the labor movement and the Negro community, because the condition of the Negro worker today is little different than it was five or 10 years ago.

With unions opening doors to Negroes in greater numbers, he said, the challenge to Negro groups is to provide men who can take advantage of the opportunity.

Apprenticeship Appeal Given New York Youths

New York—New York City youths were told "you are wanted, you are welcome" as apprentices in the city's building trades unions.

Pres. Peter J. Brennan of the New York Building & Construction Trades Council, principal speaker at a conference on Apprenticeship Opportunities for high school students told the youths, "If you have a skill you are needed, and while some crafts may be disappearing from our industry, others will be around for many hundreds of years and will need skilled workers."

Construction unions, Brennan declared, have an obligation to admit apprentices, including those from minority groups, and give them the same opportunities enjoyed many years ago by today's labor leaders. The industry can absorb them in a dozen and a half different crafts, he said, but he added a warning about job opportunities.

"Public works is the key to the whole problem of construction today," he declared. "Private industry can build only so much, and this is why the government must come in and pick up its proper responsibility.

We want the government in Washington, D.C., in Albany and here in New York City to know that we need more job opportunity. We want government officials to know that more public works building can not only fill the need for residential and commercial structures but also help keep employment in this industry at a high level."

He asserted that the present New York City administration has more than $3 billion worth of construction plans pending that should be put into operation.

Hope that the city's Board of Education would cooperate in making high school students aware of existing job opportunities was expressed by Bayard Rustin, director of the A. Philip Randolph Institute and conference chairman.

"We trust that the Board of Education will let us go into the schools and see that information about the apprenticeship program is brought to the attention of the thousands of young people who stand to gain," Rustin said.

He held that the Johnson Administration's war against poverty is linked directly with training young people in specific skills and with eliminating illiteracy.

Other speakers included Vice Pres. David Crockett of Local 6, Typographical Union; Thomas Van Arsdale, business agent of Local 3, Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers; and Myron Horwitz, a representative of the Bureau of Apprenticeship Training, New York State Labor Dept., who urged the students to "stay in school and get as much training as you can."

Dear Friend:

I have been giving a lot of thought to the ideas we tossed around during the two meetings we shared - even if they were not quite sufficient to provide the impetus necessary for our continuing regularly.

Enclosed is a statement of purposes and objectives which we might consider for our next meeting. I am also taking the liberty of giving us a "name". Please review the sheet, adding or supplementing any ideas you deem important to our mutual goals.

Would you be so kind as to advise me if a meeting can be scheduled for December 20 or 27 at noon? A phone call will suffice.

Let's move on this for expressing and creating the desired changes we are all committed to.

Sincerely,

Benjamin F. Lewis

Dear Emory:

Thank you for inviting us down. We both enjoyed sharing our experiences, and hope that our two days were helpful. As problems come up we would be happy either to personally lend a hand or have another staff member come down to assist you.

We will arrange for one of our sheet metal apprentices to come down to speak to your sheet metal group. Please try to give us a couple days notice. As agreed upon, we will pick up the full expenses for his visit.

Enclosed you will find an itemized account of both Ernie's and my expenses. You will notice that we have omitted the air fares, and it is not by mistake. Knowing your financial situation we were able to use some of the funds from our Ford grant for the fares.

I am mailing out today some additional tutoring packages containing Apprenticeship Handbooks, Interview Sheets, and Suggested Pointers for Applicants Going to be Interviewed. Also enclosed are some applications that we use in our office. If there is anything else that you need just give us a ring.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY Vol. 28, No. 36 DURH

J. P. STEVENS SLAPPED WITH 6th UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICE RULING

WASHINGTON—J. P. Stevens & Co., Inc., major supplier of textile goods to the U.S. government, deliberately reduced the flow of cotton into a company warehouse to give itself an excuse for getting rid of union supporters, a National Labor Relations Board aide has found.

The ruling, by Trial Examiner Owsley Vose, marked the sixth straight time since 1966 that unfair labor practice charges against the nation's second largest textile maker have been upheld. Two of the NLRB rulings have been sustained by the U.S. Supreme Court. Three company appeals still want to be ruled on by other U.S. appeals courts.

Vose concluded after hearing the latest charges that Stevens "deliberately changed its past methods of doing business so as to be able to reduce the volume of cotton moving" into and out of the company's Black Hawk warehouse at Greenville, S.C.

The purpose, he found, was "to have an excuse for laying off a substantial number of the group of employes which . . . the company had heard contained the largest number of union supporters, namely the warehouse employes."

Stevens maangement started its union-busting tactics when it learned in the fall of 1967 that its warehouse employes were interested in joining the Textile Workers Union of America, the examiner reported.

Though its Black Hawk warehouse was only about half full in September of 1967, Stevens "commenced consigning the great bulk of its shipments" from cotton states to an independently-owned public warehouse in Greenville, thence to its clothmaking plants.

That month Stevens consigned 73 of the 88 carloads of cotton shipped from the South to Greenville for warehousing at the independent warehouse, the examiner related.

"Earlier in 1966 and 1967, almost all the cars placed at the (private) warehouse had originally been consigned to Black Hawk. However, apparently realizing that it did not make sense to consign cotton to Commodity (the independent warehouse) when it had plenty of space available at Black Hawk, and when its own warehouse staff was comparatively idle, Stevens had 37 of the 73 cars originally consigned to Commodity" switched to its own warehouse, the examiner related.

The remaining 38 cars comprised a "significantly larger number of cars than Stevens had previously had Commodity handle," Vose said, citing the record of shipments.

Next Stevens increased its use of warehouses at Gulfport and Clarksdale, Miss., instead of Black Hawk, and at the same time laid off 20 Black Haw kemployes to bring the warehouse workers to 28—a reduction in force of unprecedented size.

And just before the eligibility period for voting in the NLRB election expired, Stevens hired three new shop employes, Vose noted. The shop employes, who repair equipment, are mainly white and the warehouse workers predominantly black, according to the report.

An NLRB agent who conducted the representation election at Greenville challenged the ballots cast by 14 of the laid-off employes, and thus prevented the union from claiming a majority.

The examiner ruled that the 14 employes, and three others laid off after the election, were discriminatorily discharged in violation of the law. Vose found that they continued to retain their status as employes, and were enitled to vote in the election.

He recommended that the challenges be overruled, and the regional director open and count the ballots of the 14 workers laid off before the vote; that the union be certified as the bargaining agent for warehouse employes if it wins a majority of the valid votes cast; or if it does not win a majority, that the election be set aside and a new election be conducted.

Vose also recommended that all the laid-off workers be reinstated to their jobs and be made whole for lost pay, plus 6 percent interest for the time they lost from work.

Vose's report goes to the board for review if the company files exceptions, as it has in all the preceding cases. The first two of five NLRB findings against Stevens were refused review by the U.S. Supreme Court. All have this NLRB judgment in common.

As a result of previous penalties assessed against J. P. Stevens & Co., a total of $666,895 has been collected, so far, by some 70 workers illegally fired by the company during the course of TWUA organizing activities in plants operated by Stevens.

LABOR EDUCATION ADVANCEMENT PROGRAM

LEAP · LEAP · LEAP · LEAP · LEAP · LEAP

A practical application for the development of programs to increase the participation of the Negro in organized labor and to enhance the opportunities for Negro Youth for entrance in the Skilled and Technical Trades.

Sponsored by the NATIONAL URBAN LEAGUE and the AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR-CONGRESS OF INDUSTRIAL ORGANIZATIONS

P. A. C. T.

(Planning - Action - and - Communication - Team)

Statement of Purposes:

The stated purposes of PACT shall be the working aims and objectives of the organization. It will constitute the basis of the involvement of the members of the organization, individually and collectively, in community issues and affairs.

To achieve its aims and objectives, this organization will plan, act and communicate for the constructive benefit of the total community from a professional and objective perspective.

Objectives of the Organization:

1. To bring together into one group concerned and responsible members of the community for the purpose of taking aggressive action on issues and programs which affect the total community relative to training and employment opportunities.

2. To provide an organizational framework through which persons and/or institutions can be sufficiently researched, analyzed, interpreted and presented as bases for making realistic decisions suited to the needs, values, problems and goals of the community.

3. To meet with appropriate public and private agency officials and their governing bodies relative to planning, programming and adopting procedures and positions with a view toward influencing and finalizing which will meet the needs, desires and best interests of the labor community.

4. To initiate and develop ways of involving more and more persons from the total labor community for the purpose of fostering greater opportunities for all citizens to participate in the economic growth of the nation.

5. To develop and maintain information on those policy making bodies which exert the most influence on the life-chance factors of this community; including, but not limited to, the City and County Commissions, the School Board, The Office of Economic Opportunity, labor unions, employers, and the Georgia State Employment Service.

Policies of the Building Trades Councils

Before any real discussion can be entered into regarding policies of the B.T.C.'s, it might be well to review the international unions affiliated with the Building and Construction Trades Department (AFL-CIO).

1. International Association of Heat and Frost Insulators and Asbestos Workers.
2. International Brotherhood of Boilermakers, Iron Ship Builders, Blacksmiths, Forgers and Helpers.
3. Bricklayers, Masons and Plasterers I. U.
4. United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America
5. International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers
6. International Union of Elevator Constructors
7. International Union of Operating Engineers
8. Granite Cutters I. U.
9. International Association of Bridge, Structural and Ornamental Iron Workers
10. International Hod Carriers, Building and Common Laborers Union of America
11. Wood, Wire and Metal Lathers I. U.
12. International Association of Marble, Stone, etc., Rubbers and Helpers
13. Brotherhood of Painters, Decorators and Paperhangers of America
14. Operative Plasterers and Cement Masons I. A.
15. United States Tile, etc. and Waterproof Workers
16. Sheet Metal Workers I. A.
17. Journeymen Stone Cutters Association of North America
18. U. A. of Plumbing and Pipefitting of the U. S. and Canada

Each of these internationals has local unions, which, of course, make up the International body. The local unions may or may not affiliate with their local Building Trades Council. Some international unions have more control than others and require their local unions to affiliate with the local Building Trades Council.

Policies of the Building Trades Councils

The Building and Construction Trades Department, AFL-CIO, is headed by C. J. Haggerty, President, and Frank Bonadio, Secretary. Together they coordinate information to the various international unions which affect building trades, principally in areas of Congressional legislation and predetermined wage rates.

There is also a plan for settlement of jurisdictional disputes between the individual trades, The National Joint Board for the Settlement of Jurisdictional disputes.

In recent years many landmark decisions have been handed down, causing repercussions of dissension among many of the trades.

The local Building Trades Councils usually negotiate the Master Agreement (area-wide collective bargaining), setting forth the conduct of labor and management for a given period of time (usually two years), which spells out details on safety provisions required, strikes or lockouts, union security and maintenance of standards.

BES for description of services offered by a State Employment Service

HOW THE PUBLIC EMPLOYMENT SERVICE HELPS SMALL BUSINESS

By Louis Levine

Director, United States Employment Service, Bureau of Employment Security
U.S. Department of Labor, Washington, D.C.

The State Employment Services are affiliated with the United States Employment Service (USES), a part of the Bureau of Employment Security in the U.S. Department of Labor. They provide [redacted] with many services which are helpful in meeting personnel needs and in solving manpower problems. Assistance is given locally. About 1,900 full-time and 2,000 part-time local offices of the State Employment Services constitute the public employment service network. They are found in every State and in the District of Columbia, Puerto Rico, the Virgin Islands, and Guam.

Delete

~~The Employment Service can be particularly helpful to small and medium-sized businesses which do not maintain complete personnel departments and which, therefore, may need help in resolving employment management problems. This Aid suggests how you can utilize the various technical services which are available without charge through public employment service offices.~~

SUMMARY OF PRINCIPAL SERVICES AVAILABLE

Based on over 30 years of cooperative research with industry on personnel matters, the State Employment Services provide specialized recruitment and placement service, employment management services, and current labor market information to employers.

The 1,900 local offices of these State Employment Services are generally equipped to offer [redacted] the following services:

(1) Recruitment of workers in all occupations and for meeting employers' personnel needs resulting from attrition, expansion, and staffing of new plants, establishments, and offices.

Delete

~~(2) Locating qualified workers not available locally through a nationwide interarea recruitment service which includes a professional placement network of about 1,[illegible] selected offices.~~

(3) Selecting the best qualified workers through the most modern interviewing and testing techniques. Aptitude test batteries have been validated for more than 500 specific occupations.

(4) Testing (including the use of the General Aptitude Test Battery) and counseling of youths in the fields of work for which their aptitudes and interests best fit them.

(5) Giving guidance in resolving employment problems, such as turnover and absenteeism, and in maintaining an adequate work force, and assisting in personnel planning by use of job analysis and related techniques.

(6) Providing information on labor supply and demand on a local, State, and national basis.

(7) Initiating training courses--under the Manpower Development and Training Act and other training programs--to help in alleviating existing shortages of qualified workers and in meeting expected needs for additional trained workers.

(8) Relating veterans' service training to civilian occupations.

LOCAL OFFICE IS FOCAL POINT FOR SERVICE

The point at which to make the first contact is the State Employment Service office in your own community. This is true regardless of the type of assistance you need on recruitment or employment management problems. You will find that this office concerns itself with the employment needs of local businessmen and workers. Members of its staff are trained to locate, select, and refer qualified personnel. They help analyze manpower problems, develop plans of action, and generally provide assistance and advice. Accordingly, it would be to your advantage to develop a continuing relationship with the staff of the local office.

To locate an office of the State Employment Service, consult your telephone directory. If there is no office in your community, you can get the address of the one nearest you by writing to the headquarters office of the State Employment Service--usually located in the State capital.

The Employment Service is concerned with improving the recruitment, selection, placement, training, and utilization of workers, and it is there to help you in these areas of personnel work. (However, it does not enter industrial engineering fields, such as the analysis of plant layout or job evaluation.)

RECRUITMENT OF WORKERS

State Employment Services recruit workers in all occupations--professional, technical, and managerial--as well as in the skilled, semiskilled, and unskilled categories. They are organized to meet your particular specifications for current and future manpower requirements.

Matching jobs and workers requires adequate occupational information. Therefore, the degree of success achieved depends not only upon the quality of service provided by local office personnel but also upon your presenting a clear picture of what you need as an employer.

The following actions will help you to obtain the best possible service:

(1) List your job vacancies with your State Employment Service, either by phoning or visiting your nearest local office and be as specific and informative as possible.

(2) Invite an employment service representative to visit your establishment--he can learn about your jobs and you can learn about the services available through the local office.

(3) Make your job qualifications realistic, and the pay should be in line with the requirements of the job.

(4) Give the Employment Service enough time to find the best applicant for your opening.

(5) Inform the local office promptly of your hiring decisions regarding the applicants referred to you.

(6) Refer to the local Employment Service office applicants who apply directly to you, whenever you do not have an immediate need for them.

FINDING SKILLS NOT AVAILABLE LOCALLY

If workers with the required skills are not available in the community, your local office can tap the facilities of a nationwide interarea recruitment system to meet your needs. The 1,900 Employment Service offices throughout the Nation are more than local labor exchanges serving employment needs of communities. They are links in a nationwide network. Through the process of interarea recruitment, an employer with an opening for a certain type of worker, and an applicant who is qualified for that job--each in a different city--can be brought together.

The Employment Service in its interarea recruitment operations offers a variety of methods for referring the qualified worker, or a record of his qualifications, to the employer. The local employment office can advise as to appropriate methods and areas of best applicant potential. It can also assist employers in arranging recruitment itineraries and advance publicity.

PROFESSIONAL PLACEMENT SERVICE

The public employment service places special emphasis on its professional placement program to keep pace with the rapidly growing importance of professional workers in the national economy. Specially trained staff members in local offices are assigned to serve employers and workers in the recruitment and placement of professional, technical, and managerial personnel. Most major metropolitan areas have separate divisions--and in a few cases separate offices--to concentrate efforts on meeting these employment needs effectively. Cooperative relationships with many professional organizations have been established, including placement service at their annual conventions, in an effort to promote applicant-employer accessibility in these demand fields. Employers seeking professional, technical, and managerial personnel and applicants possessing these qualifications are thus brought together through a specialized service geared to their needs.

- Professional Office Network

The Employment Service has a Professional Office Network connecting about 120 key cities in the United States and Puerto Rico. It provides nationwide service for employers seeking workers in professional, technical, and managerial occupations and for applicants in search of such jobs. These offices serve as major recruitment points--for professional workers--for the 1,900 local employment offices. They receive from all States and Territories listings of professional, technical, and managerial job openings that cannot be filled locally. When qualified applicants are available, these offices can communicate directly with any of the other 1,900 local offices by telephone, telegraph, or air mail. This plan greatly facilitates bringing together your job openings with applicants who are qualified and available to fill those jobs.

The Employment Service can also help you to prepare and schedule newspaper and radio advertisements to aid in attracting the workers you may need from out of town.

OCCUPATIONAL COUNSELING AND TESTING

The Employment Service has developed the most comprehensive employment counseling and testing program in the country. The United States Employment Service and its affiliated State Employment Services, in cooperation with industrial management and labor unions, have validated aptitude tests for more than 500 specific occupations.

About 1,500 local offices are now equipped with testing facilities. Aptitude tests are designed for use in selection and counseling of inexperienced workers. They measure potentiality for acquiring occupational skills. Proficiency tests are designed for use in selection of experienced workers, and they measure occupational skills already acquired, such as typing. The use of Employment Service tests in selection benefits the employer through referral to him of test-selected applicants.

While selection devices are already in use for a large variety of occupations, many jobs are not yet covered. If you require test-selected applicants for one of those jobs, the United States Employment Service with the help of the appropriate State Employment Service will, if feasible, develop tailor-made tests to meet your needs.

JOB INFORMATION MATERIALS

The Employment Service is also equipped to give you practical help in manpower planning through job analysis and occupational classification. It has developed a wide variety of tools and methods designed to cope with problems in these areas. Local Employment Service offices can be of assistance regarding the application of these tools and methods in the solution of your particular manpower problems. An example is the Dictionary of Occupational Titles, a publication which has been used in the classification of workers and job openings since 1939.

The Dictionary of Occupational Titles can provide you with assistance in: (1) recruitment and placement; (2) converting job titles to standard terminology; (3) planning upgrading and transfer programs; (4) preparing staffing patterns; (5) defining job duties for use in job and wage evaluation, indicating skill levels, and showing job relationships; and (6) conversion planning to show the relationship of previous experience to new jobs.

REDUCTION OF TURNOVER AND ABSENTEEISM

Employment Service tools and techniques can help to solve manpower problems resulting from absenteeism and turnover. Underutilization of skills, lack of opportunity for promotion, unsatisfactory working conditions, low wages, and poor supervision contribute to absenteeism and high turnover. Based on years of experience in working with many employers, the Employment Service can assist you in analyzing the causes of your problems and in determining what can be done to maintain a vigorous, stable work force.

Suggestions for Control of Turnover and Absenteeism, an Employment Service publication, is designed to help you in this connection.

LABOR MARKET INFORMATION

Labor market information is compiled by the Employment Service. You can get it upon request. It includes data on employment and unemployment trends, demand and supply of labor by occupations, labor market outlook, wages, labor turnover, and related factors. Such information, compiled on an area, industry, or occupational basis, may be helpful to you in planning recruitment activities, training programs, and expansion or location of new plants or establishments.

Publications, such as the Bureau of Employment Security's Employment Service Review, which contains detailed information on some aspects of labor market developments; Area Labor Market Trends; and a wide variety of State and area labor market "news letter" releases contain useful information. Occupational labor market information is available through job opportunities information surveys.

JOB OPPORTUNITIES INFORMATION

Some State Employment Services conduct area skill surveys. They provide information about current and expected manpower requirements and training needs by occupation. Such information is essential to a community in its long-term manpower planning. Intensive community-wide efforts are needed in many localities to improve the skills of the work force and to meet current and future skilled manpower requirements.

SPECIAL PROGRAMS DEALING WITH NATIONAL MANPOWER PROBLEMS

The Federal-State employment service system is geared to provide assistance in coping with changes in the labor market. It can assist in meeting employment problems resulting from automation and technological change and from persistent underemployment and unemployment. Some major national programs stemming from these problems, in which the Employment Service is involved, and in which you have an interest, are:

- Area Redevelopment Activities

The Area Redevelopment Act emphasizes the concern of the Federal Government with problems of localized chronic unemployment. Under the Act, loans are provided to increase employment opportunities in areas designated as redevelopment areas on the basis of persistent unemployment or low income. Training and retraining of unemployed and underemployed residents are also provided as well as payment of subsistence allowances to eligible workers while in training. Local employment office responsibilities under the Act include: (1) obtaining facts needed for identifying areas designated for redevelopment; (2) reviewing the manpower aspects of the overall economic plans for those areas; (3) determining the occupations and number of workers for such training as may be needed; (4) selecting and referring individuals for training; and (5) payment of subsistence allowances to eligible workers in training.

- Manpower Development and Training

The Manpower Development and Training Act provides for institutional and on-the-job training; payment of training allowances; special counseling and training of youth 16 through 21 years of age; and modest transportation and subsistence payments to individuals receiving training away from home. Unlike the Area Redevelopment Act, training under this legislation is available to all areas of the country.

The Manpower Development and Training Act requires that all training project proposals be supported by an appraisal of training needs, prepared by the local public employment office, to determine those occupations where labor demand exists or is expected. The vocational school system and the public employment office carry out the training program at the local level.

On the basis of information obtained by local offices concerning the needs of unemployed workers for training and of employers for trained workers, occupations are identified for manpower training.

- Automation and Technological Change

Among current manpower problems is the rapid extension of automation and other technological changes. New technology has caused an accelerated rate of attrition in jobs in many important industries. Local offices of State Employment Service are available to explore with employers scheduled or foreseeable technological changes and their potential effects on workers and plant employment patterns. This service permits the resources of the local office to be brought to bear on the problems of fitting the displaced workers into new employment.

GETTING A LIST OF UNITED STATES EMPLOYMENT SERVICE PUBLICATIONS

The bulletin, Bureau of Employment Security Publications, lists, describes, and explains how to order all USES publications available to the public. CONFERENCES WITH H.U.D. PEOPLE (~~10~~ 8)
July 8, 1966

(Miss) Susan Bresler, Urban Planner
Urban Planning Project

1. Mr. Les Persells. Mr. Persells struck me as an optomistic bureaucrat: like his agency is taking care of everything.

I learned that urban renewal staffs now have a social services coordinator. On a large staff, this person would be a social worker. The social services coordinator sees that the residents of the project area get the social (welfare) services they need. I still don't think HUD is organizing the people in the project area. But at least the urban renewal staffs deal more with the individual problems of people in the project area than in the past.

The Community Action Programs (CAP) may do more than HUD to promote community organization. The CAP's make diagnostic surveys of an area to identify the "socioeconomic problems" of the residents, whatever that means. Still doesn't sound like giving the poor a voice in actual planning. But CAP's do inventory existing organizations in the neighborhood and may even form block clubs. I don't know. See "Interim Guidelines for Encouraging LPA Coordination with Local Anti-Poverty Programs."

Mr. Persells admitted roundabout that planners don't figure the needs of minority groups into their plans. Rather, planners make plans on the basis of 1) good land use-traffic planning and 2) getting the plan carried out (implemented).

So, a minority group could influence planners by helping solve land use-traffic problems and by helping carry out plans.

But who could help the minority groups understand the plans?

2. Mr. Hoffman. Mr. Hoffman felt that localities need their own coordinator for Federal programs.

Paris has a revenue problem. The wealthy people living in the city own large horse farms in the county. City and county governments don't cooperate.

Paris is 30% Negro; its depressed areas are predominantly Negro. The proposed renewal project will rennovate an entire area and provide needed public housing.

Mr. Hoffman described Mayor Rains as "a nice old gentleman." The Mayor's efforts include building codes and high school expansion.

The newspaper is cooperative with urban renewal. It is not racist.

The Citizen's Advisory Committee, which can be a very effective tool to influence the city, is inactive.

Mr. James S. Wilson tries to get money for the city; Frazier Haddix, Director of Urban Renewal knows the most about Paris; Judge Leer and Mr. Saunders, head of the Housing Authority, are influential in Paris. Paris trained a good building inspector by sending him to Lexington for a month to work with the inspector there.

3. Mr. Agee. Mr. Agee had an interesting argument to sell renewal to the city: Do you want the people your children go to school with to come from substandard housing?

Louisville is 60 % Negro. The city's new leadership is interested in renewal. The city has one large slum and other spotty areas.

Judge Abbot controls the bank. He helps people in the community apply for Farm Home Administration loans to improve their homes. The loans are for low-cost housing.

Louisville has some strain in race relations, but the people are trying to do something about it, Mr. Agee said.

The city has trouble enforcing zoning. The main barrier to renewal in Louisville is the cost. Louisville participates in the Central Savanna River Area Planning and Development Commission (whew).

Mr. Agee seemed spirited and very eager to help small communities.

4. Mr. Jacobson . Mr. Jacobson was the only Urban Renewal Representative I talked to today who empahsized the social service function of renewal. In fact, it was practically all he talked about: heart-rending stories of individuals in the project.

Macon has both a social service manager and a field worker. A man named Dave Lucas, a former high school coach, gives adult education classes. Macon's Community Action Program is examining neighborhood facilities for the project area.

In the last five years, Macon has become a very dynamic community and has a big public works program.

B.F. Merritt is a strong full-time mayor. Doug Feagin is Director of the Urban Renewal Program. The city itself is the local public agency (LPA) rather than a separate renewal agency. Macon has its own city-county planning commission and also takes part in a five-county regional planning commission.

5.& 6. Mr. Patterson and Mr. Watts. These gentlemen used to work with Birmingham and Corinth respectively. The present Urban Renewal representatives for these cities are now McGill and Grouby.

About the only significant thing that came out of the discussion (I was getting tired by then) was that HUD has no record of Negro developers.

7. Mr. Vernon Plaisted. Unfortunately, Mr. Plaisted won't have Ashville any more. The new man is Gibbons. Mr. Plaisted says the Urban Renewal program would be a lot easier to administer and a lot more fair to cities with little money if the non-cash grant-in-aid were eliminated and the Federal share of renewal costs upgraded to something like 90%, like it is with the highway program. The way it is now, localities choose their projects on the basis of these credits. Otherwise, the cities couldn't raise enough money to pay their local one-third share.

Mr. Plaisted pointed out that social services in rehabilitation areas, as opposed to clearance areas, can begin as soon as the application for renewal goes into HUD.

8. Mr. Jim Mills. Mr. Mills caught us by the coattail to tell us why he selected Corinth and Birmingham. He says Corinth has solved many of its problems. A publication telling the story is coming out soon. Birmingham, by contrast, still has many problems that need solving. For one thing, Birmingham doesn't have the focal of minority group leadership that Corinth has. The two cities should make an interesting contrast.

Mr. Smith. During the conferences Mr. Smith explained how the Urban Planning Project is one part of a five part grant from the Ford Foundation. The other parts are prisoner rehabilitation, voter education, community organization, and labor relations.

What the Southern Regional Council wants to know from its Urban Planning Project is how equal opportunity can become more a fact than a principal, for this affects urban planning. Open housing means not just integration but equal availability of housing as well.

Mr. Smith emphasized the lack of economy in a split system of facilities for whites and Negroes. The planning of these facilities has important effects on the economy.

Federal funds support racial equality. The Southern Regional Council can deal with people HUD can't reach and, in this way, help carry out the intent of the Federal law.

Mr. Smith suggested worksheets for the disadvantaged people to survey their own neighborhoods and an outside advisor to help work with the city government.

This is to tentatively project an outline for your work while at SRC. Your main responsibility will be to analyze the 6 Cities composing the SRC - Urban Studies (HUD). After you have had a little time to get oriented and to think this through I would like your recommendation on procedures for research or analysis and methods for presenting and proposing to HUD and/or the cities involved. It would be presumed that we would vary any approach to suit each case

Because we are quite tardy in returning the data on Charlotte I would like to get this material reviewed and a memorandum prepared for the files reviewing this in a consise manner.

Our action on contact towns other than the HUD selection, namely: Athens, Georgia; Charlotte, N.C.; Chapel Hill-Durham-Raleigh, N.C.; Ft. Lauderdale, Florida ; Houston, Texas ; Little Rock, Arkansas are to be used as fillers (other than the Charlotte materials review)

Please let me know when you are ready to review the above.

RESUME CITY OF BIRMINGHAM

The City of Birmingham has undertaken a new vision of itself since the City government was reorganized from the Commission form of City government to the Mayor and City Council form of government. Mayor Albert Boutwell and the City Council have set high goals to be obtained for the citizens of this great city. Among these goals are:

1. A decent, safe and sanitary home for every citizen.
2. Well planned neighborhoods for the raising of families.
3. A system of major streets and expressways to adequately move the present vehicular traffic and provide for future increases in such traffic.
4. Provide for the cultural and recreational activities through a $25,000,000 civic center complex including a coliseum for sports activities, a theater and art museum for cultural activities.
5. Medical facilities will be expanded in an area known as the Medical Center which will provide some of the best of such facilities in the nation for not only the citizens of Birmingham but also specialized medical care throughout the region.
6. Participation in the relatively recent concept of region wide planning for growth and development through the Birmingham, Jefferson County Regional Planning Commission.
7. Assist and encourage the improvement and beautification of the City through such activities as parks and pedestrian plazas and the improvement of buildings both structurally and aesthetically.
8. Elimination of slums and deteriated housing and the increase of new low rent public housings, housing for moderate income families, and low cost sales housing.

Practically all of the above activities have been brought about to a greater or lesser degree by the Urban Renewal and Public Housing programs being participated in by the City. Through these programs the Federal government has provided many millions of dollars to the City of Birmingham within recent years. Urban Renewal projects which have been instrumental in assisting the City in the achievement of progress are the following:

1. Medical Center Site A completed June 1959. Federal funds provided $261,637.
2. Avondale Site C completed June 1965. Federal funds provided $2,091,002.
3. Ensley No. 1 Urban Renewal Area now nearing completion. Federal funds provided $1,858,698.
4. Medical Center Expansion Area now in the process of planning. Federal funds to be provided $5,816,000.
5. Civic Center Urban Renewal Area now in the process of planning. Federal funds to be provided $2,154,000.
6. Proposed West Park Urban Renewal Area. Federal funds not yet determined.

Birmingham, Ala

7. The Druid Hills Code Enforcement Area which was the first such activity approved in the nation will provide grants and low interest rate loans of funds to low income home owners for the purpose of bringing the condition of their homes up to the minimum standard established by City of Birmingham Housing Ordinances. It is expected that Federal funds in an amount exceeding two million dollars will be provided to the City for these activities.

Key People in the City of Birmingham:

Albert Boutwell, Mayor
William Hamilton, Mayor's Assistant
Hugh Denman, Executive Director, Housing Authority of the Birmingham District
James Wright, Director, City Planning Department
Guy Tate, Administrator, Druid Hills Code Enforcement Project

RESUME

MACON, GEORGIA

Macon, situated in almost the exact geographical center of Georgia, underwent an annexation program approximately three years ago which resulted in a doubling of population to a total of approximately 125,000. The city, in recent years, is very progressive and in many respects has an excellent record on intergroup relations. The Urban Renewal Program was initiated in Macon under a previous term of office served by the present Mayor, B. F. Merritt. The first urban renewal project was a relatively small project which cleared out some Negro-occupied slums and is now in the process of being sold for industrial reuse. While special studies showed that the area could be used for multi-family housing, a firm decision was made by both PHA and FHA that they would be unwilling to participate in multi-family housing in the first urban renewal project area, Ga. R-12, Tybee.

Macon has pursued a program of city planning for many years and has excellent maps and a very satisfactory city plan kept up-to-date. The planning is accomplished by a constitutionally-established planning and zoning commission, the membership of which is self-perpetuating. The decisions of the planning and zoning commission are final and are not subject to review other than by court. Because of the high caliber of the membership, this decision-making power has worked satisfactorily.

Macon has one of the oldest PHA-aided low-rent public housing programs in the south. It is being added to at the present time and other projects are in the planning stage.

In October of 1963, Macon initiated a General Neighborhood Renewal Plan study covering a large portion of east Macon just across the river from the Central Business District. This study originated as a means of producing a proper site for a new coliseum for which a bond issue had just been passed.

In January and May of this year, Projects Ga. R-94 and Ga. R-95 were approved to enter the execution stage. Ga. R-94 consists of 48 acres all of which should be used as the site of low-rent public housing. It will displace 133 families, 33 individuals, and 9 businesses. Project Ga. R-95 contains 145 acres for total clearance with a reuse consisting of a stadium, a coliseum, an office park, a motel, and various retail commercial establishments. It will displace 420 families, 89 individuals, and 41 businesses. Most of the families in each of these projects are Negro and a small part of the businesses are Negro-owned and operated.

In addition to the members of the Citizens Advisory Committee for which a list of key members is attached, key people in the city are:

B. F. Merritt, Mayor
R. D. Feagin, Jr., Director of Urban Renewal

William W. Hibbert, Director of Planning
George Markwalter, Executive Director, Housing Authority of the City of Macon
Ed Wilson, Professor of Law, Emory University - Immediate Past Mayor
Bill Thompson, Architect

RESUME'

ASHEVILLE, NORTH CAROLINA

The population of Asheville, North Carolina, is somewhere over 60, 192 at this time. The city, noted for its many tourist attrations shows the need for a revitalization of its residential and commercial structures. To this end, the city officials have taken on an extensive residential and business improvement program. Specifically, 500 new units of low-rent public housing is programmed for construction; 502 acres of slum clearance through urban renewal; and, a comprehensive and rigid enforcement of housing code on existing structures.

Urban Renewal Project No. N. C. R-13

This 77 acres project will be redeveloped primarily for new commercial and public uses. It is located in the eastern section of the Central Business District and now contains a concentration of 120 dwelling units, all but 15 of which are deficient or substandard.

Having been in execution since 1964, the relocation of some 150 families and 70 business concerns are 87% completed. Community wide cooperation has been evident in relocation of site occupants.

The persons this agency have been working directly with are as follows:

Earl W. Elder, Mayor
Weldon Weir, City Manager
James W. Greer, Executive Director
Vitto F. LaPore, Rehabilitation Officer
Norma Grayson, Social Work Coordinator
Eric Hill, Planning Consultant
Ruth Mase, Contractor for Diagnostic Survey

Urban Renewal Project No. N. C. R-48

This 425 acres project will be redeveloped primarily for residential reuse. It is located southwest of the Central Business District and contains 1,250 dwelling units, of which 1,000 are classified as deficient. Redevelopment will be in the form of rehabilitation and the development of new public and private low and middle income housing resources.

There will be a total of 704 families and individuals and some 50 business concerns displaced and relocated. The relocation process is to take place in stages in order to eliminate to the maximum extent possible, the hardships inherent in moving. Plans are that all displaced families and individuals will relocate back into the redeveloped area.

In order to assure orderly and expeditious relocation of site occupants, the local public agency has established an office in the project area where advice and assistance is readily available (see attached bulletins).

All local public and civic agencies of the community have been contacted relative to their providing every assistance possible to project area residents. The local Economic Opportunity Authority is establishing an office in the project area through which assistance will be provided area residents throughout the planning phase of the project - with the view of eliminating individual family problems prior to relocation.

A diagnostic survey is being conducted in the project area, from which the information obtained will be utilized in solving the problems identified.

Following are the persons this agency have been working with directly in the planning of the subject project:

Earl W. Elder, Mayor
Weldon Weir, City Manager
James W. Greer, Executive Director
Vitto F. LaPore, Rehabilitation Officer
Norma Grayson, Social Work Coordinator
Eric Hill, Planning Consultant
Ruth Mase, Contractor for Diagnostic Survey

THE COMMUNITY IMPROVER

INTRODUCING. . .

Vito F. LePore who comes to us from Chicago via Southern Italy. Mr. LePore received his early education in Italy before coming to the United States, where he studied architecture at Wright Junior College in Chicago and the University of Illinois.

He has been employed by various architectural firms in Chicago and Knoxville. At his latest position he served as a designer for 2 years and later as an associate member with Mr. Hubert Bebb, architect. During this period, Mr. LePore has been involved in the development of shopping centers, resort complexes, churches, schools, motels, restaurants and residences. While in this association, Mr. Bebb and Mr. LePore were commissioned to prepare studies and final design presentations for a workable solution to the ever present decaying conditions in the central business district in Morristown, Tennessee. This rehabilitation and conservation project received 1st prize in the national convention of NAHRO.

In 1964, Vito married Virginia Robison. He and Mrs. LePore are presently expecting the first addition to their family.

WE APOLOGIZE. . .

We intended to print reports from each group in the East Riverside Area - thirteen in all - in this first issue, but we have had trouble procurring them.

The best sources of information this paper has are its group reporters. These people are in a position to get the "scoop" on news in their groups. We want to know what you are doing - and we want to print it for everyone to read. Reporters, we need your help; let us hear from you!

NEW NEWS

This newspaper is a "first edition." It is the beginning of what we hope will be a long series of papers published exclusively for the residents of the East Riverside Redevelopment Area to promote better understanding of Urban Renewal - especially Urban Renewal in our area.

Some of the articles in this paper are donated by residents of the area; others are written by the staff of the Redevelopment Commission.

The idea is communication. Through this paper our East Riverside citizens can tell the Redevelopment Commission their opinions and questions, and the Commission can more quickly inform the citizens of the latest developments in the program.

It is hoped also that East Riverside residents will make use of this paper to make their

This picture has been repeated many times in past weeks at the "Rehab" office on Livingston Street. Groups get together to talk, joke, have fun, and learn how to knit.

And knitting isn't the only thing that goes on in the evenings at 86 Livingston Street. There are classes in typing, sewing, rug making, and an art class for the younger set.

Give them a ring. Find out what's going on. If you aren't interested in any of these things, tell them what you would like to do. Chances are you're not the only one who would like to see another class started. The number is--------- 253-4745.

ANY QUESTIONS?

Many questions have been asked about Urban Renewal in the East Riverside Project Area in past months. Some of the answers to these questions we feel would be of interest to many people who perhaps have not asked for them but have been wondering.

In the future copies of this newspaper, this column will be devoted to answering the questions of our readers. Naturally, some questions would be of broader interest than others. We will limit our answers to those questions. Other inquiries that are concerned with individual matters will be answered personally.

Please address your queries to Questions, Redevelopment Commission, Box 7148, Asheville, North Carolina. Let us know whether or not you wish your name to be mentioned. If your question is of general interest, look for an answer in this column in the very next issue.

BEWARE OF "SLICK OPERATORS"

Most home building, maintenance and home improvement contractors are honest in their advertising and selling, but there are a few unscrupulous "bait" advertisers and high-pressure sellers against whom you must constantly be on guard. To protect yourself and your family.....

DON'T DEAL WITH THE "BAIT" ADVERTISER WHO offers an unbelievably low price..... then tries to add on "EXTRAS" or "SWITCH" you to something much more expensive.

DON'T FALL FOR THE "MODEL HOME" SALES PITCH. . (the promise of commissions for use of your home as a "DISPLAY MODEL").

WATCH OUT FOR fly-by-night roofing or chimney repair operators who "JUST HAPPEN TO BE IN YOUR NEIGHBORHOOD" and who offer you a "SPECIAL DEAL".

BEWARE OF IMPOSTERS falsely claiming to be "SENT BY THE CITY" or "THE REDEVELOPMENT COMMISSION". Remember, CITY INSPECTORS or REDEVELOPMENT COMMISSION EMPLOYEES MUST DISPLAY CREDENTIALS ON REQUEST, WILL NOT try to SELL you anything....and cannot RECOMMEND any particular COMPANY or PRODUCT.

DOUBLE-CHECK ON ZONING, HOUSING and legal occupancy requirements and on CITY REDEVELOPMENT COMMISSION PLANS for the area BEFORE BUYING OR BUILDING A HOME OR MAKING ANY SUBSTANTIAL EXPENDITURE for ALTERATIONS or IMPROVEMENTS.

DEAL WITH AN ESTABLISHED CONTRACTOR....Ask for a list of previous customers whose satisfaction you can determine.

DON'T HESITATE TO GET ESTIMATES from several contractors (based upon the same specifications) to make sure you will not be OVERCHARGED. FIND OUT the exact FINANCING TERMS, as interest rates VARY. REMEMBER that the FHA and lending agencies DO NOT INSPECT or GUARANTEE the JOB for MATERIAL and WORKMANSHIP.

Watch for continuation next month!

The house below is familiar to a great number of East Riverside residents. We'd like more people to become familiar with it.

This address - 86 Livingston Street - is an excellent example of what rehabilitation can do for a badly deteriorated house. Neighbors will tell you that before this house was improved, it was as bad as many of the worst in the area.

Some paint, some gutters, some screens and storm windows made this house a solid one once again. It will last now for many more years.

The Redevelopment Commission saw this house as an ideal location for the east Riverside field office and rented it for the purpose. Vito LePore, William Roland, Norma Grayson and Leilani Littlejohn, all Redevelopment Commission employees, want you to visit and see how rehabilitation can save an old house.

COMING DIAGNOSTIC SURVEY

Starting toward the end of March and for the following weeks, the Redevelopment Commission will be sponsoring a Diagnostic Survey of the East Riverside area. The first part of this survey will consist of meetings and discussions in the area to inform you, the resident, as to what questions will be asked and why they need to be asked.

The purpose of this program will be to promote better understanding of Urban Renewal, to find out what services are needed and wanted in the area, and to give YOU a chance to have a part in making your area a better place in which to live.

MOVIES

We are fortunate in having the Mental Health Center participate with us in the presentation of a film series, concerning the family, its members, and some of their problems. These films are both entertaining and informative.

Dr. Richard Pallazza, Psychologist with Mental Health Center, will conduct an open discussion period following each program.

We invite all teenagers, young adults, and adults to attend at Livingston School at 7:00 p.m. on the following dates:

Wednesday, April 6
- Family Life - 15 min.
- Palmour Street - 21 min.

Wednesday, April 13
- Meeting Emotional Needs in Childhood - 30 min.

Wednesday, April 20

ANNOUNCEMENTS

Mr. Clarence Nearer, the grandson of Mr. and Mrs. Cannon, 216 Asheland Avenue is attending Asheville Buncombe Tech., taking the Data Processing course.

Miss Diane Blakely, the niece of Mrs. Eleanor Carpenter, 31 Blanton Street is attending Livingston College in Salisbury, North Carolina.

Miss Julianna Calhoun, the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Willie Calhoun, 249 Asheland Avenue is attending Winston-Salem Teachers College in Winston-Salem, North Carolina.

Miss Sandra Nicholas, the niece of Mrs. C. N. Harris, 62 Blanton Street is attending Asheville-Buncombe Tech., taking the Executive Secretarial course.

Mr. and Mrs. Archie King, 20 Blanton Street are happy to announce the marriage of their daughter Olivia Frances to Mr. Ronald Dean Cook on December 7, 1965.

The Sunshine Neighborhood Club met Sunday, January 23, 1965 at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Robert McAdams. The topic of discussion was a "Spring Tea". The next meeting will be held Sunday, March 27, 1966 at the home of Mr. and Mrs. James Ferguson, 97 Blanton Street. They gave money to the needy at Thanksgiving as their last project. Group IV, Sandra Nicholas, Reporter

IMPORTANT MEDICARE INFORMATION

IF you are 65 years old or older, you are probably eligible for medical and hospital insurance that is financed mostly by the Federal Government. This program is operated at no cost to you if you are not working. It is like Social Security in that respect.

If you are 65 or older, the Medicare program will help you pay your hospital bills. BUT YOU MUST SIGN UP. THE DEADLINE IS MARCH 31, 1966, and that is not far away. For information, call Mrs. Grayson at 253-4745, or come by the Rehabilitation Office at 86 Livingston Street --we have a limited number of informational pamphlets. Or call the Social Security Administration at 252-8773.

THIS IS IMPORTANT AND THE TIME IS NOW!

PROGRESS THROUGH COMMUNITY EFFORT

THE COMMUNITY IMPROVER

MAY WE INTRODUCE. . .

W. E. Roland, a native of Asheville and a graduate of public schools here. After his early training, he attended vocational schools in Norfolk, Va., Philadelphia and Pittsburgh, Pa. After returning to Asheville he operated a jewelry store from 1948 until 1965 at which time he accepted a position as Rehabilitation Advisor with the Redevelopment Commission of the City of Asheville.

His interest and continual contact with the people of the East Riverside Area have made him one of the Commission's most popular employees. His civic efforts to improve his community have made him a public figure.

He is a member of the Hill Street Baptist Church where he serves as Superintendent of the Church School. He is on the Board of Trustees of both the Church and the Hill Street Nursery School, which is located in the Church. He is also a member of the Board of the Youth Advisory Council

Mr. Roland is a Shriner, and he is Chairman of the Advisory Board of the Service Credit Union of Asheville. He continues to be very active in community affairs. In 1962 he received the annual Man of the Year award from the Omega Psi Shi Fraternity for his outstanding achievement in the area of social action.

WHAT IS URBAN RENEWAL?

When anything big is in the wind (and urban renewal is BIG), rumors start blowing around, too. We've heard some of them, and we know there must be others where those came from

Some people think a bulldozer will sweep away their house, leaving them to shift for themselves. Others think it is a gift from Heaven that will put them in a good house and pay all their bills.

Neither idea is true. Urban renewal is neither all good nor all bad. It is a program of our federal government for the City of Asheville that we all support through taxes. This program is designed to help cure the problems of bad housing in our cities.

Urban renewal can do this better than any other program, public or private, because it has the revenue of the federal government behind it, and also because of the great fund of experience that has been amassed for the last number of years by redevelopment authorities all over the nation. Urban renewal is a specialist when it comes to curing sick cities.

Some parts of our city have become so dilapidated through misuse or neglect that only a major operation such as clearance and rehabilitation can save them from complete decay. In order to save these areas, many houses must be bought and demolished to provide space for modern, well-planned housing. This is not profitable. Even if private builders could afford it they

(This article is a continuation of last month's article on how to avoid being "taken" by dishonest home improvement contractors.)

NEVER SIGN A CONTRACT IN BLANK! READ BEFORE YOU SIGN...AND AND KEEP A COPY. INSIST that all PROMISES and GUARANTEES be confirmed in WRITING. CHECK the CONTRACT with an ATTORNEY BEFORE SIGNING FOR MAJOR PURCHASES.

REMEMBER THAT YOU...THE HOMEOWNER... ARE HELD RESPONSIBLE for the proper correction of violations and you must also make sure that any alteration or improvements are in conformance with housing and building regulations.

DON'T GIVE the work your final "OKAY" until it has been passed by the CITY INSPECTOR and the REHABILITATION OFFICER of the Redevelopment Commission.

DON'T SIGN A "COMPLETION CERTIFICATE" before the job is finished to your satisfaction and the required CITY and REDEVELOPMENT COMMISSION REHABILITATION OFFICE INSPECTIONS HAVE BEEN MADE. IF YOU DO, the contractor may collect his money from the financing agency, BUT FAIL TO COMPLETE THE WORK.

DON'T SELL YOUR PROPERTY.

WHO ARE THEY?

In the next few months, the faces in the picture above will become more familiar to everyone in the East Riverside Area.

Dwight Patterson and Morris Johnson will be calling on people at home, talking to organizations, and getting small groups together to find out what should be done to make East Riverside an even better place to live.

A survey of the area will be made by interviewers going into each home in the early part of June. Dwight Patterson and Morris Johnson are working to make everyone familiar with the material in the survey.

Look for them. Let them know what you are thinking...and ask questions!

APRIL IS YWCA MONTH

During this month, visit your YWCA and find out what you can do. Make new friends - learn new skills!

There is a program for all ages. Join today! Just come to 13 Grove Street or 185 S. French Broad Avenue - or give your membership to one of the campaign workers.

CAN YOU FIND YOUR HOUSE IN THIS PICTURE?

This is a bird's eye view of the East Riverside Area. It was made from a small plane last fall. It shows almost all of the project area from Hilliard Street (lower right hand corner), to Walton Street Park (upper left hand side) - from the tracks (those tiny little oblong things are box cars), to Coxe Avenue. The landmarks numbered on the picture are: 1. Aston Park, 2. YWCA, 3. South French Broad High School, 4. Livingston Street School, 5. The Rehabilitation Office, 6. Walton Street Park.

PTSA BEAUTIFIES

The Parent-Teacher-Student Association of South French Broad High School has entered whole-heartedly into the program of the Redevelopment Commission.

Recently, two projects, a talent show and a tea, provided $198.25 to pay for shrubbery which has been planted around the school. This shrubbery helps beautify our school and at the same time indicates the Association's cooperation with Urban Renewal. --Miss M. E. Jones

MOVIES

Educational movies will be shown at the Livingston Street School on the nights of April 20 and April 27 at 7:30 p.m. Dr. Pallazza, a psychologist, will lead a group discussion after the films are shown. All East Riverside residents are cordially invited.

More than 1½ times as many babies die in the East Riverside Area than in other sections of similar size. Greater care needs to be taken with our newborn.

URBAN RENEWAL - Continued from Page1

could not make much profit. Urban renewal is not designed to make money, but to use it to improve our city and to help provide better housing for our citizens.

Urban renewal is an Asheville operation with most of the money coming from the federal government. The City of Asheville makes all the important decisions concerning where renewal is to take place, when it will happen, and what the new land is to be used for. In this way Asheville is sure to do what her citizens want.

When the plans that are now being made are completed, probably by January, 1967, the Redevelopment Commission will start buying the houses in the East Riverside Area that are too dilapidated to be repaired. Owners will be offered a fair price, based on two or three separate appraisals. No one will be left homeless. Each family, whether it owns or rents, will be given assistance, both personal and financial, in finding a "standard" place to live. By "standard", we mean a place that is as good or better than the city housing code requirements. It is a place as good as or better than the house that must be torn down.

There are other houses in the area that are in fair condition and can be improved to "standard" through rehabilitation. In some cases, this work can be done with low-interest rate government loans to include rehabilitation while actually lowering monthly house payments.

Urban renewal is not a "gift". It will cost some people money. In some cases, it causes people a certain amount of inconvenience. It is not a program which will help everyone, but it will help almost everyone. It is the only way to turn our run-down neighborhoods into communities that once again offer the citizens a decent, healthy place in which to live and work.

LIVINGSTON STREET SCHOOL PROJECT

A beautification project was launched by the Livingston Street School PTA, Student Council, and Grade Mothers. Mr. Edington, principal, said the PTA hopes this project will spread. This project is in cooperation with the city-wide Beautification Project.

The PTA meets next-April 19, at 7:30 p.m.

THE COMMUNITY IMPROVER

MAY WE INTRODUCE. . .

Mrs. Norma Grayson was born in Alabama but raised in Asheville. She is the daughter of the late John and Leila Michael. Her father was for 30 years a principal of Hill Street School where her mother also taught for the same number of years.

Mrs. Grayson is a graduate of Stephens Lee High School and Knoxville College, Knoxville, Tennessee. Later she received her Masters Degree in social work from the Atlanta University School of Social Work, Atlanta, Georgia. She has studied at the New York School of Social Work and attended workshops at University of Chicago, Chicago, Illinois. For some years she was case worker with the Family Service Society, St. Louis. She next was an interviewer with the State Employment office in N. C. During the war she was a Field Director of the Red Cross Prior to her present position with the Redevelopment Commission, she was a clinical social worker with the Veterans Administration in New York City for 19 years. While with this agency, she served as a supervisor of Trainee Social Workers of Fordham University and the New York School of Social Work.

PLANNING FOR RENEWAL

Many plans are being made to improve the area in which you live. The East Riverside area is the center of attention nowadays. Much time, effort, and money have gone into plans to make it one of the nicest sections of town.

There are two stages in any Urban Renewal Project. One phase is "survey and planning." The other is the action phase in which the plan is carried out and the area is renewed. We are presently in the first stage. We have not yet completed all the plans and preparations necessary for intelligent action. No buildings will be purchased or land cleared until these plans are completed.

When plans are finished and the time comes for renewal, we hope each person will support the effort to make East Riverside a better place to live. -- Editor

MOTHER'S DAY

This is the time of year I stop for just one day to appreciate the First Lady of my life; the lady who always thinks of me as her "baby".

If I have done wrong, it is always Mother who sees the spark of goodness in me through all the shabbiness, and loves me still. If I have done well, it is Mother who beams with pride.

It has been jokingly siad, "A man is never truly old until his Mother stops worrying about him." -- Kent Washburn

THE FABLE OF A CITY CALLED ASHEVILLE

Long, long ago, in a high enchanting valley in the Blue Ridge Mountains, was a city called Asheville.

Its climate, location, and scenic beauty made it famous as a tourist attraction the world over. It soon acquired the nickname "The Land of the Sky."

Asheville was a simple community consisting of a commercial or shopping cone surrounded by a residential area, which again was surrounded by farms and timberland.

The demands of this uncomplicated society were adequately met by the City Administration.

But the coming of the industrial revolution, automobiles, and the population explosion changed the city of Asheville drastically.

Lack of city planning and code enforcement produced insurmountable problems which the city administration could not overcome financially and administratively without state and federal loans and grants.

Since World War II, growing decay at the heart of Asheville has been the Number One problem. For 25 years, slums have grown and real estate values and municipal tax income have dropped.

The affluent and then middle-income families headed for the suburbs and the downtown and the surrounding residential area deteriorated.

Industry has brought its share of problems, hodgepodge land use, industrial stench, air pollution, water pollution, besides contributing to the crowded and unsanitary living conditions.

The automobile has produced junk yards, traffic congestion, strip development, parking problems, air pollution, decentralization of cities and wholesale slaughter on the highways.

Well aware that these conditions have become a nationwide trend, in 1963, the City Fathers decided to investigate the possibility of using the urban renewal program in the hope of renewing the vitality of older and worn-out neighborhoods - a task financially impossible by the City Administration. A few months later a conference was held between the urban renewal people and City Administrators to determine which area would best be benefited by this program.

The area known as East Riverside was chosen for two reasons:

(1) The cost of building the South French Broad High School $1,400,000 - will provide the City of Asheville with the majority of her one-third share of the cost of this urban renewal project.

(2) 55% of the structures in this area can be rehabilitated feasibly now - but not later.

In January 1965, the City of Asheville received advance funds to begin its survey and planning work. We are presently in this phase of the operation.

SOMETHING TO GET FIRED-UP ABOUT

What if someone told you that the possibility of your house burning is 100% greater than the average Ashevillian? If you live in one of the 1,000 blighted houses in the East Riverside Redevelopment Project, your chances of having a major fire are just about twice those of the average person in Asheville.

The major cause of fires in the Project Area seems to be careless smoking. Be careful! Many houses in this area are like kindling waiting to be lit. The second major cause is faulty wiring. This is a problem that must be corrected by Community Improvement. Too many houses have no electric outlets on the walls. Drop cords alone provide electricity in many cases. This wiring is not meant to furnish power for such high-drain appliances such as toasters, frypans, refrigerators, or television sets. Something must be done if this appallingly high incidence of fires is to be checked.

The Young Women's Christian Association, founded 110 years ago in London, England, now is at work in 75 countries around the world, including 5500 locations in the USA. In Asheville the YWCA has been serving women and girls for 59 years.

These smiling faces belong to Brownie Troop No. 127. They have good reason to be smiling; they just have come downstairs from a meeting of games and songs.

These girls meet in the same Rehab Office room each Tuesday from 4-5 p.m. Besides singing and playing games, they discuss good citizenship and plan hikes and outings.

This past Easter, the Brownies made and delivered Easter cards to the patients at the Silent Rest Nursing Home.

Troop No. 127 is sponsored by the New Mount Olive Baptist Church, and is under the leadership of Gail and Betty Sligh. (Miss Sligh is pictured in the back.)

LIVINGSTON STREET SCHOOL REPORTS

Mrs. Mary R. Sligh represented the Livingston Street School PTA at the State PTA Convention in Lumberton, North Carolina, recently.

Those of you who are interested in finding out what went on there may find out when she gives her report of this meeting to the Livingston Street School PTA at the regular meeting Tuesday, May 17, at 7:30 p.m.

Also slated for this meeting is a report from the First Grade teachers on an experimental reading program they have been conducting with their students. This should be interesting.

MEDICARE - AGAIN

So many people failed to sign up for the benefits of Medicare in March that President Johnson asked to have the deadline extended.

If you have not signed up, you may do so until May 31. Don't wait until the last minute!

For information, call Mrs. Grayson at 253-4745; or call the Social Security Administration at 252-8773.

Y-TEEN QUEENS

Marche Forney (right), of the Shiloh Y-Teens, was crowned at the Y-Teen Extravaganza which was held at the South French Broad YWCA, Saturday, May 30. Judy Foster of the Livingston Y-Teen Club, was the runner-up.

The program consisted of a "Fashionetta", "Fashions of Yesterday, Today," by the South French Broad Y-Teens (advisor, Mrs. C. P. Chandler); a skit entitled "A Y-Teen Dreams," involving all Junior Y-Teen clubs; and a dance number by Carolyn Lyles of the South French Broad Club.

Sherrie Stevens, a Livingston Y-Teen, played the leading role in the skit, and Brenda Gibson, Miss Y-Teen of 1965, crowned Miss Y-Teen for 1966.

The program was sponsored by the YWCA Teenage Committee, Miss Delores Carnegie, Chairman.

NEW APARTMENTS FOR THE ELDERLY

The Housing Authority of Asheville has revealed plans for a new hundred-unit apartment building for the elderly. This structure will be located on three and one-half acres of land next to Aston Park on South French Broad Avenue. A general administration building is also planned.

The main building will be 7 stories high and will contain 335 rooms. More than half of the apartments will be used by people who will move from substandard houses in the Redevelopment Project Area.

This building will be an attractive addition to Asheville housing. It will provide space for meeting and recreation, an area with automatic washers and dryers to be used by the occupants, and quiet, roomy apartments. There will be a range and refrigerator in each apartment, and two automatic elevators will carry people quickly and safely to and from their rooms.

We should be seeing the beginning of construction late this year. This is real progress!

THANK YOU!

For the past several weeks, the "Rehab" Office at 86 Livingston Street has reported a great number of visits and phone calls by East Riverside residents who are interested in the Urban Renewal plans. We welcome this kind of interest.

As plans for the project progress it appears that more and more people are taking a personal interest in these plans. Many want to know how Urban Renewal will affect their houses. Others are asking the Rehabilitation staff what they could do to improve their property. Some have already started a program of improvement.

In an area as large as East Riverside, success will come only with your interest and effort. Thank you for your visits and phone calls. Let us hear from more of you!

May We Introduce . . .

Leilani Littlejohn was born in The Bronx, New York City, but was reared in Asheville where she attended and graduated from St. Anthony's Parochial School. She later attended Notre Dame Academy in Cleveland, Ohio, but returned to Asheville where she completed her high school education at Allen High School, in 1955.

Leilani then went to New York City where she became employed by the R. H. Macy Company and was employed there for several years. During this time she attended secretarial school furthering her skills in secretarial work. She has worked in the secretarial-receptionist field since her graduation in 1955.

Miss Littlejohn is now employed as secretary-receptionist with the Asheville Redevelopment Commission where her professional demeanor and winning personality are an asset to the Rehabilitation Office.

DIAGNOSTIC SURVEY PROGRESSES

Thirty-five surveyors have been selected to conduct the East Riverside Diagnostic Survey. The survey will begin Monday, June 6. We ask for your cooperation in this important program.

PUBLIC HEARING

A Public Hearing will be held in the Court House on May 31, 1966, in Room 409, at 7:30 p. m. The Urban Renewal Plan for East Riverside will be discussed, and everyone will have a chance to voice an opinion. This is your opportunity to see first-hand exactly what is being proposed and to be heard on the matter. More than any other single group of citizens in Asheville, the East Riverside families will benefit from this program. The East Riverside Project needs your support at this meeting.

URBAN RENEWAL PLAN SUBMITTED

At a meeting of the Redevelopment Commission on Tuesday, May 17, the Urban Renewal Plan for the Redevelopment of East Riverside was approved for submission to the Federal Government. What this means is that the program for East Riverside is on its way towards being endorsed. Before the project actually gets under way, the citizens of Asheville must be heard at the public hearing to be held May 31, at 7:30 p.m. in Room 409 of the County Court House, the City Council must approve it; and a bond issue will probably be held to provide the city's share of the cost. All of this will be accomplished by December of this year — if the citizens of East Riverside and other citizens of Asheville join in support of this program.

SPONSORED BY E CHAMBER OF COMMERCE

CHAMBER OF COMMERCE MEETING

On Wednesday, May 18, the "Mountain Boomer" Club, an offshoot of the Chamber of Commerce, held a regular breakfast meeting. The program was presented by the Redevelopment Commission. Photographs of some of the conditions in East Riverside were shown along with a plan to renew the area. James W. Greer, Executive Director of the Commission, spoke for few minutes concerning the blight and deterioration that are present in the area, and gave his opinion as to how the area might best be redeveloped. Concerning urban blight, he said:

> I can think of no better illustration for the effects of urban blight than the well-used comparison with cancer. Deterioration of housing in a neighborhood is to the health of the whole community what cancer cells are to the health of a person. Without treatment, blight spreads . . . left alone, blight will engulf all of East Riverside.

He further stated that:

> The only answer at this point for the cancer of urban blight in East Riverside is major surgery and rehabilitation. The pockets of decay must be cut out. The weak areas must be given a chance to revitalize themselves.

Mr. Greer indicated that the costs of renewal would be only about 1-¼ million dollars compared with its total cost of about 10 million dollars. He said further that this project would bring in additional new construction of private and low-rental housing costing about 10 million dollars more — at no cost to the City of Asheville. Therefore, the East Riverside area will receive the benefits of 20 million dollars worth of renewal at a cost to the city of a little more than 1 million dollars. He said, "It doesn't require the new math to tell us that this is a good exchange of money."

As fortunate as Asheville is in the financial arrangements for the East Riverside Program, Mr. Greer was quick to state that financial considerations are not the main reason for the project. He said:

> Specifically, the prime consideration for the East Riverside Project is the opportunity of improving the living conditions of almost 5,000 citizens of the City of Asheville. (The people who live in East Riverside)

In closing, he commented:

> I know that in East Riverside there is a nucleus of proud and intelligent citizens . . . who would seize the opportunity of transforming their neighborhood, if it were offered.
> The Urban Renewal plan offers East Riverside this opportunity.

SPACE PROGRAM

URBAN RENEWAL is a little like the American space program. Our country has launched a series of rockets and tried a number of experiments in order to reach the moon and advance modern science. The moon program has taken and will take months of planning and experiment and action and infinite patience. It is a big and important project.

In East Riverside, we are not trying to reach the moon, although it might seem like it to look at our extensive plans and surveys. But we are involved in a big and important project. This program involves our homes and our everyday lives. And it will take patience.

A big step forward has just been made. The plan for East Riverside has been submitted to the Federal Government. This plan is the result of months of study and hundreds of visits with the residents of East Riverside.

This plan includes better streets, new storm drainage to keep Southside and Depot from flooding in heavy rains, two new parks, new houses, a new fire station — and "Nasty Branch" will be cleaned up.

Many old and unsafe houses must be taken down. The owners of these houses will be helped to find a good place to live that is safe and clean. The moving expenses of these people will be paid, and in some cases, a "relocation adjustment payment" may also be paid by the Redevelopment Commission. The houses these people will move into will be "standard", that is, they will be screened, will be heated, and will have good plumbing with hot and cold running water.

The Redevelopment Commission will do its best to help the people that are displaced find places to live that are suitably located. Since there will be many new houses built in the area, this should not be hard to do.

This program will be very expensive. It will cost about 10 million dollars. But only a little more than one million dollars of this money will come from Asheville. The federal government will make up the difference. There are other costs that cannot be counted in dollars. Some people will be inconvenienced in having to move from houses they have lived in for many years. Other people may dislike the necessity of repairing their homes. But to renew an old neighborhood, to make our homes safer and our neighborhood better, and to give our children better places to play, live, and grow up in, we feel is worth the trouble we'll be taking.

We expect that actual work can begin on the East Riverside Area in the early part of 1967. At that time, the Redevelopment Commission will begin to approach the owners of the property to be acquired. There is just a certain amount of space in East Riverside, and Asheville's "space program" is designed to make the best use of it.

SOUTH FRENCH BROAD HIGH SCHOOL EVENTS

The 1966 Senior Class of South French Broad High School will present its class night program on Friday evening, June 3, at 8:00 p.m. in the Lee H. Edwards Auditorium.

The class will hold its Vesper Service on Sunday afternoon, June 5, at 4:00 p.m. Dr. G. Gordon Mahy, presently instructor of English at Warren Wilson College, will be the speaker.

Commencement Exercises will be held on Monday evening, June 6, at 8:00 p.m. in the Asheville City Auditorium. The speaker will be Dr. Kenneth R. Williams, president of Winston-Salem State College. There are 141 candidates for graduation for 1966.

LIVINGSTON STREET SCHOOL PTA ELECTS OFFICERS

The Livingston Street School PTA held its final meeting of this school year on Tuesday evening, May 17. Mrs. Pauline Seabrook presided over this important meeting at which new officers for the coming year were elected. The new officers are:

President—Mr. Charles Samuel
1st Vice President—Reverend J. T. Jones
2nd Vice President—Mrs. Bertha McAdams
Secretary—Mrs. Marguerite Shivers
Asst. Secretary—Miss Margaret Orr
Chaplain—Miss D. C. Williams
Treasurer—Miss F. M. Owens
Program Chairman—Miss Pauline Seabrook
Reporter—Mrs. A. M. D. McElrath

THANKS MRS. SZITTYA

Our thanks to Mrs. Sandar Szittya, one of our volunteer teachers who has completed her instructional period in a ten lesson typing course for adult students. Now that Mrs. Szittya has fulfilled her commitment, she will be giving full time to her place of employment. We feel that she has made a real contribution toward the goal of helping people help themselves. As to date at least one student has found a place of employment in this capacity. Mrs. Szittya leaves with this group's sincere appreciation.

IN CASE OF FIRE DIAL "0"

Sometimes in an emergency people don't think too clearly. It is hard to remember that to report a fire, the number to call is 252-5311 - in order to get the Fire Department. Or to get the help of the Police Department, one should call 252-6411. But it is always well to remember the magic number "0" for Operator. You can always dial "0" and tell the operator the nature of the emergency and the location.

YWCA SUMMER DAY CAMP SCHEDULE

This year the YWCA has announced that it will expand its "Summer Fun Camp" to include programs at the Skyland Community Center and Weaverville Community Center in addition to the regular camp at 13 Grove Street, so that a greater area may be served. The two community center programs will be coeducational.

Courses in skills such as crafts, music, dancing, camp craft, nature, swimming, games, land sports, fishing, and boating will be taught, depending upon the facilities available at each location. The hours will be from 9:00 to 3:00 Monday through Friday.

Later in the summer, an enrichment program will be offered for Junior High age girls. This program will expose the girls to a combination of cultural, social, mental, spiritual, and physical enrichment.

Information on rates and dates may be obtained by calling 254-4343 or 254-7206.

ANOTHER PUBLIC HEARING

Another public hearing will be held for the East Riverside Urban Renewal Area. This time it will be held by the City Council in City Hall. The hearing will be held on the 2nd floor, at 4:00 p.m., on June 23rd. Again, all interested citizens of Asheville are urged to attend and voice their opinions. We especially urge the residents of East Riverside to appear at this very important meeting. This will be the last chance you will have to support the East Riverside Urban Renewal Area at an official Public Hearing.

Three R's Revisited

At Livingston Street School next year, some first-grade pupils will not be reading such things as "See John run. Run John, run." Instead they will be reading from books such as Riding by Pony Express, The Tree is a Plant, The Boy who Drew Birds, or The Maverick Cow.

Dr. R. E. Robinson, Assistant Superintendent in charge of Instruction in the City Schools, has designed a program to stimulate the minds of our young readers. "We do best what we are most interested in," Dr. Robinson asserts. All over the country, it has been proved that children treated as individuals and given reading material interesting to them improve their reading skills more rapidly than children given the standard 1st Grade Reading course.

According to the Principal, Mr. Edington, the 2nd and 3rd grades of Livingston Street School have adopted this successful program for this fall. So 4th graders, don't be surprised if your 1st grade brother or sister wants to borrow your books to read.

APPROVAL EXPRESSED AT PUBLIC HEARING

The Public Hearing that was held on the last evening in May was very successful. The feeling was that a number of questions were answered, and on the whole, there was a response of wholehearted approval from the people of East Riverside in particular and the city in general.

The meeting began as Mr. Alfred Miller, Chairman of the Redevelopment Commission, called the meeting to order and explained the rules by which members of the group could speak concerning the project.

Mr. James Greer, the Director of the Redevelopment Commission, was introduced next. Mr. Greer presented the plan for renewal of the 410-acre East Riverside Area. According to Mr. Greer, it will include a large neighborhood park of about 12 acres, two or three small parks of from 1 to 3 acres, provision for neighborhood shopping area, for expansion of the two schools in the area, for a YMCA branch, a new fire department and community center. With regard to housing, the Public Housing Authority will construct 500 units designed to blend in with private housing, and it is expected that private builders will build from 150-200 units, both single family and apartment type.

Mr. Greer stated that it was the Redevelopment Commission's intention to preserve as much of the existing neighborhood as possible. He said that the 4,800 people of the area are the most important consideration.

Mr. Greer indicated the net cost of the project (after sale of land) to be $8,742,002.00. Asheville's part of this is less than $3 million. But due to some credits that the city [illegible]able to claim from the construction of South [illegible]ch Broad High School and the anticipated Public Housing, the cash cost will be only $1.4 million. For less than 1½ million dollars, the East Riverside Area can see many million dollar's worth of improvement.

Mr. Miller, the chairman, then opened the floor for any questions or comments.

A question was asked concerning whether a library would be provided. Mr. Greer said that plans on this matter were uncertain as yet, but that some facility would be available for the loan of books.

Miss Fannie McCoy spoke in opposition to what she termed "Metropolitan Government." She said she believed the Redevelopment Commission was out to control the land and the man. She took her stand against "high taxes and poisoned water." She stated her opposition to a "socialized, communistic, collectivist government," and feared that perhaps this would be the last time the people of Asheville would be allowed to vote for their sheriff.

Mr. Michael of 64 Phifer Street indicated his support of the East Riverside Urban Renewal Project, and made a request of the realtors that they begin dealing more in Negro real estate.

Mrs. Pickard of the Buncombe County Planning Council stated that her agency was primarily concerned with the needs of the people, that she had been working with the Redevelopment Commission in this program, and was pleased that the Commission also was primarily concerned with the needs of the people. She said that she and the Planning Council favored the contemplated Redevelopment Program.

Mr. Ruben Dailey, a well-known lawyer from the area, made the statement that he was one of the first to vote for the project. "I was for it then, and I am for it now," he said. "I think it's going to really do something for this section." Mr. Dailey said that the people of East Riverside must be on their guard for the "hawks" who would try to spread rumors and false information in order to buy and sell real estate. He warned that the people must not listen to the "street lawyers" and others who pretend to know about the program, but that they must listen instead to the trained personnel of the Redevelopment Commission who could give them the facts and save them needless worry. He deplored those "hardship cases that you create yourself." He said that Washington is made up of people like ourselves, some of whom come from North Carolina, who are interested in the people. He said this project is a good project—"You are going to be benefitted by it." He said that Asheville will now have a chance to get some of her tax money back, as we have a right to. He closed by again warning the residents to be level-headed: "I am concerned about the errors that we make in panic." And he again urged the people to listen to the advice of the Redevelopment Commission employees.

Dr. Joseph Schandler, the Asheville Housing Authority Chairman, then spoke about the new kind of housing that will be built. He said the new housing would be completely different from the Lee Walker Heights, Pisgah View, and Hillcrest housing. "You won't see any more of this type of public housing in Asheville." He spoke about the modern, 7-story high-rise apartment near Aston Park and the 100 units of housing near Walton Park. "You won't be able to tell these from the finest homes in Asheville."

At this point, Mr. Allen, the chairman of the Executive Committee of the Citizens Participation League, (who is one of those property owners to be displaced by project activities), made a motion that the program as recommended by the Redevelopment Commission be approved. The motion was seconded by Mr. Wilkins and was then passed almost unanimously.

Mr. Algary, a member of the City Council of Asheville, said that the people now had the opportunity to make of East Riverside, not just a nice place to live, but a "showplace" in Asheville. He said that with the loving care that the area deserved it could be a place where anyone would be glad to live.

After only one hour, the meeting was adjourned, and the overflow crowd began to leave.

ON THE VERY NEXT DAY, a special meeting of the Redevelopment Commission was held to adopt a resolution approving the plan for East Riverside. The resolution was adopted and sent that same afternoon to the City Planning and Zoning Commission, where it also received the approval of that body.

THE NEXT STEP toward redevelopment of East Riverside is the submission of the project to the City Council for a public hearing to be held by the City Council on June 23. After this hearing, the City Council will then approve or disapprove the project.

A NEW PLACE TO LIVE

One of our East Riverside residents, a lady who will be unable to read this story because she is blind, will soon be benefitted by the activities of the Housing Authority and the Redevelopment Commission. For a long time, she has lived in a very large, very old house. She made her living by renting rooms to tenants she was unable to manage because of her blindness.

The Housing Authority of Asheville will soon approach her to buy her property as a site for new housing. Because of this, she is now preparing to make her home elsewhere.

Recently she applied for additional aid from the Welfare Department to supplement her social security so she would be able to live without her tenants until she receives payment from the Housing Authority for her property. It will then be up to the Redevelopment Commission to pay her moving expenses and to see that she is suitably relocated in a house or apartment that is clean and fully equipped for her.

It will be a pleasure to see her receive a fair price for an old house that she would probably not be able to sell otherwise and to see her moved from that dangerous old house to a safe, much newer place. She tells us she is looking forward to moving.

SAINT ANTHONY OF PADUA SCHOOL

"Toward a Better Christian Education and Building of Character"

June 3rd saw another crop of fine young ladies and gentlemen passing from the hands of the Allegany Franciscan Sisters into Asheville High Schools. These youth have had the advantages of an education integrated and permeated with the teachings of Christ.

The graduates and their teacher, Sister Mark Francis, O.S.F., were honored at a Mass in the morning followed by a breakfast in the school hall. During the breakfast the parents and guests of the graduates enjoyed the reading of the Class History, Will, and Prophesy.

The graduation exercises in the evening were dignified and impressive. Alma Burson, Robert Dorn, Joselyn Goodwin, Glynis Holmes, Cathy McAdams, Vernelle Ray, Freddy Ryans, Cherri Samuel, and Gerald Smith received their diplomas from Reverend Joseph L. Howze, pastor and administrator of the school.

The valedictory address to the graduates was by Robert Dorn. His talk was followed by that of Dr. Otis B. Michael, guest speaker and alumnus of Saint Anthony's School.

The graduates recessed to the notes of "Pomp and Circumstance" after Benediction of the Blessed Sacrament.

SOUTH FRENCH BROAD COMMENCEMENT

On June 6th at the Asheville City Auditorium, 144 young men and women graduated from South French Broad High School. These graduates listened attentively to the commencement address by Dr. Kenneth R. Williams, President of Winston-Salem State College, and then received their diplomas from Mr. Sales and Mr. Schell (both members of the City Board of Education), and Mr. W. P. Griffin (Superintendent of the City Schools).

Hal Guess was the Valedictorian and also received the Alumnus Award. Others receiving awards were Patricia McKinney, who received the W. S. Lee Citizenship Award; and Walterine Elaine Morehead, who received the Pearlman Family Award.

WE APPRECIATE . . .

All the many residents of East Riverside who took time out to attend the first Public Hearing for the East Riverside Area. You performed an important service for your community and for your city. Any project of this great size and importance depends upon the interest and involvement of the people, and the overflow crowd at the hearing certainly proves that you are interested and involved.

We owe a special "thank you" to those individuals who spoke at the meeting, who either asked questions or made a statement.

DIAGNOSTIC SURVEY

In the next couple of weeks, surveyors will be completing their assignments in the East Riverside Area. Residents have been most helpful to them in allowing them to come into their houses and ask many questions. All of these questions are important in helping the Redevelopment Commission prepare for the coming renewal program. We thank you for your assistance.

PARIS, KENTUCKY

Paris, Kentucky, has a population of approximately 7,800. The City has completed two Urban Renewal projects with the reuse of the land being primarily for Public Housing.

Urban Renewal Project No. Ky. R-57

An estimate of approximately 29 white and 92 non-white households reside in this area. It is planned to stage the redevelopment of this area to provide low-rent housing for the elderly in the initial stages of the project for occupancy by households living within the area.

The City is presently planning a project of approximately 13 acres of slum clearance and a comprehensive codes program. Approximately 60 new units of low-rent housing are planned for this area.

The persons this Department has been working directly with are: Emil Rains, Mayor, Frazier Haddix, Director of Urban Renewal, James S. Wilson, City Attorney.

An active Citizens Advisory Committee is working with City Officials and residents of the proposed Urban Renewal area to insure that each family is fully appraised of the progress of the project.

RESUME'

CORINTH, MISSISSIPPI

Corinth, Mississippi is located in the extreme northeastern section of the state (approximately 90 miles southeast of Memphis, Tennessee) and currently has an estimated population of 13,500.

The Corinth Urban Renewal Commission was organized early in 1960 and has been an active and vibrant force in the community. Initial Urban Renewal discussions began in early 1961 with the Workable Program for Community Improvement being initially certified in September of the same year.

A Survey and Planning application for the Highway 45 Urban Renewal Project (Project No. Miss. R-6) was filed in late 1962 and approved in April 1963. This project has since entered the execution phase and the LPA is now acquiring property. Reuse of the land is planned for Public Housing, lots for private low-cost housing and commercial.

In November 1963 an application for a Community Renewal Program was approved and this study is now nearing completion. The Study will outline objectives and methods for the undertaking of a broad range of Federal programs and badly needed public improvements.

In addition to the two Urban Renewal Programs, the Corinth Urban Renewal Commission has administered several activities or programs authorized by the office of Economic Opportunity.

Principal contacts in the community:

1. John D. Mercier, Mayor
2. Troy Morris, Chairman, Corinth Urban Renewal Agency
3. James Billingsley, NYC Director
4. Lew Miller, Chairman, Planning Commission
5. Hugh Hopper, Executive Director, Corinth Housing Authority
6. Professor E. S. Bishop, Principal, Kasem High School and Member, Citizens Advisory Committee
7. Mrs. Viola Lusk, Housewife and Member of Citizens Advisory Committee

RESUME'

LOUISVILLE, GEORGIA

The population of Louisville, Georgia, is somewhere over 2,500 at this time. The city officials have taken on an ambitious residential improvement program. This can be broken down into three categories: 70 new units of low-rent public housing; 31 acres of slum clearance through urban renewal; and, a comprehensive codes program for compliance on new construction and rigid enforcement of housing code on existing structures.

Urban Renewal Project No. Ga. R-103

This project will be redeveloped primarily for residential reuse. It is located about two blocks northwest of the Central Business District and now contains the largest concentration of substandard housing in the county.

There will be a total of 103 families and 8 businesses relocated. The city's plans at this time are to stage the urban renewal program to provide for persons to be relocated back in this area or adjacent to it.

This community appears to have made use of a relatively unfamiliar program of the Department of Agriculture. The local Farm Home Administrator has encouraged the use of Farm Home Administration loans, and the local bank has established a referral service for persons not able to meet the requirements of bank policy, or Federal Housing Administration type loans. This cooperation has shown much benefit to the community on a whole.

Dear Mr. Papageorge:

Complying with your letter to me of May 24, 1965, I have appointed the following community-wide, representative group to the Citizens Advisory Committee:

1. I. Goldwasser, furniture store owner, Chairman of Louisville Planning Commission.

2. J. P. Morgan, Contractor.

3. T. V. Henson, farm implement dealer.

4. W. F. Easterlin, Jr., bank executive.

5. E. B. Carroll, local Georgia Power Company representative.

6. Odell Hannah, negro, contractor, active civic leader.

To a special committee on minority group housing, I have appointed:

1. Odell Hannah.

2. Alton Spells, negro, schoolteacher, resident in area under consideration for renewal.

3. Roy Fleming, negro, mechanic, resident in area under consideration for renewal.

FORT LAUDERDALE, FLORIDA
February 21 and 22, 1966

Moreland Griffith Smith, FAIA
Director, Urban Planning Project

I visited the city at the invitation of Mr. James Hibben, Urban Renewal Agency, to consult with him about two different urban renewal plans presently under consideration by the city government.

Impressions on walking tour:

All the homes in the Negro neighborhood have poor drainage and depressing views. Even the best Negro homes are adjacent to the incinerator or city dumps. The housing construction is poor, and for the most part the homes are built of highly inflammable wood construction. (Florida pine has an excessive amount of sap; when this dries, the wood is almost explosive.) There would be complete loss in case of fire. Insurance companies refuse to insure Negro frame dwellings because of this hazard.

Throughout the Negro neighborhood except in the areas of higher value homes, I observed many "winos." Many dives for wine, beer and games of chance were evident, and there was indication of an appreciable per cent of dope addiction.

There seems to be very little dynamic Negro leadership. With the physical environment, if the people ever wake up from their coma brought on by dope and alcohol, this section could ignite into a southern Watts. This is true even if the city urban renewal authority succeeds in putting over their plan which means minimum neighborhood improvement.

Prospects for urban renewal:

Mr. James Hibben, Executive Director of the Urban Renewal Agency, is a young man in his late thirties with two children. He came to

FORT LAUDERDALE, FLORIDA
February 21 and 22, 1966

Moreland Griffith Smith

Fort Lauderdale last year from Chicago and has a two-year contract. He seems sincere in his desire to make changes which would better conditions in the Negro community and perhaps lead to some integration. Whether he will be able to accomplish any of his plans remains to be seen. He must persuade the city officials and gain support from the Negro community. He feels he needs pressure from Negroes to help him make his point to the city. This is one of the new Southern cities where the leadership is "business conservative" and therefore will go to lengths to preserve a good "image" nationally for inspection by prospective new businesses. If the Negro community applied pressure, Hibben thinks he would be enabled to make changes.

At present Hibben is considering two schemes for urban renewal. Either would be superior to what the Negro community has now as far as environment. Naturally the better one costs more.

1. "Dry Scheme" - the less expensive plan; has the advantage of being close to the city and less expensive.
2. "Canal Scheme" - more advantages and amenities, the chief advantage being that the fill from the canal would be used for elevation and to improve drainage for the Negro homes. This is the better plan of the two, and more expensive. Unfortunately, the improvements are "structural" and therefore do not show up easily to taxpayers or to the disadvantaged Negro community which would hope for more physically impressive improvements.

Neither scheme would affect more than a small percentage of the substandard dwellings nor does either try to strike at the root of the problem. Both are simply attempts to placate the disadvantaged, inarticulate and generally ignored Negroes in the hope that city government and white citizens can buy several more years of blissful unconcern with this festering sore in the body politic.

CHARLOTTE, NORTH CAROLINA
March 3, 1966

Moreland Griffith Smith, FAIA
Director, Urban Planning Project

I went to Charlotte to meet with city officials and let them know of the SRC Urban Planning Project and our services. Dr. Ray Wheeler arranged the meeting with the mayor, city manager and their staff. Mr. John Wheeler joined us for the day, and Mr. Fred Alexander, Charlotte alderman who is on our board, met with us.

After introductions, I reviewed SRC's new Urban Planning Project, telling of its intent and the services which might be of interest to Charlotte. These officials were reluctant to discuss Charlotte openly and freely, and their attitude was hostile. The city government appeared to have strong reservations about SRC and the project and to be sceptical as to any value Charlotte could derive from interchange and informal association. Shortly before the meeting ended I mentioned that were I to review their urban renewal plans as an informed third party SRC's opinion might have weight with the federal government in its assessment of Charlotte's compliance with federal directives on urban planning. This would mean that an impartial review, if affirmative, might help Charlotte when applying for more federal funds. At this point in the conversation the four of us encountered a sudden and marked change in attitude by the city officials. All at once they couldn't give us enough information; they instructed one another to send this or that semi-confidential report to me in Atlanta. (None of this material has yet arrived as of March 10, 1966.)

At lunch Dr. Wheeler, Mr. Wheeler, Mr. Alexander and I discussed this baffling change in atmosphere. All of us felt it, but none of us could spot exactly what made the difference. As far as I can tell it appeared at the point where the mayor, et al, realized they would have nothing to lose and much to gain, including a better position for federal funding. And the whole service would cost them nothing more than the postage to send their information and plans to Atlanta for review.

I found a high degree of intelligence in the city government; it is confident, self-centered, aware, motivated by self-interest but willing to listen. My only criticism would be their attitude and outlook on regional planning.

Charlotte's importance is primarily that of a transportation center for its area, and regional planning is most pertinent for the continuing growth of the community in the future. Because it is a distribution point it draws people in a 60 or 70 mile radius into the city for services and goods. But there was no awareness on the part of the city government of any need for regional planning. Their attitude was that they had too many problems in the city to worry about without trying to develop a comprehensive plan for the entire region. Actually Charlotte and Durham-Chapel Hill-Raleigh are interdependent, and these cities need to realize this now and begin a far-sighted examination of how to solve their mutual problems and plan for their mutual growth. As yet this awareness is lacking; so are the federal incentives for such planning.

The mayor has an unusual understanding of business, commerce and the financial needs for the city. He is strongly influenced, however, by Arthur G. Odell, Jr., FAIA, Charlotte architect. Odell, while highly intelligent, is a pompous ass interested only in what will glorify Odell.

I was highly impressed and pleasantly surprised at the quality of the city manager and the other staff members I met.

Fred Alexander is a very able Negro; he is not looking out after self but has a broad and unselfish view. Alexander is faced with the problem of conflict and jealousy in his own community and among his own people. He told me that when he first became an alderman he was hostile and suspicious of all whites, including other aldermen, and their motives. After examining his attitude he realized that he was just as prejudiced as he accused them of being. With that insight he was able to destroy his own prejudice and in so doing has been able to work more effectively in the city government and make more gains for his constituents.

I took a tour of the Negro community. Some of Charlotte's slums are as bad as the worst in the South, but they are smaller in area and fewer in number of dilapidated dwellings. The better Negro homes were better than in other cities I've examined, and there was a large quantity of nice middle-income Negro housing. The middle-income housing was the typical type of developer sub-division housing financed under FHA and VA. This housing has only been available in the last four or five years. The physical facilities of the schools in this area were way above average for the South both school building structure and grounds.

It is interesting to note that there have been a number of improvements in conditions and services for the Negro community since the election of a Negro alderman. For instance, the Negro cemetery now has a fence around it like the white one and the interior roads there have recently been paved. Streets in the poorest Negro sections have now been repaired.

I asked the city officials about the possibility of passing a fair housing law in Charlotte and was told it was very unlikely. The only housing integration in the private sector is along fringe areas where whites are moving out at the border of the Negro section and Negroes are occupying the newly available dwellings. The public sector is little better. Public housing has been built along this Negro-white border, and those units immediately adjacent to the Negro side are integrated while the other units are all-white.

RE: CONFERENCE WITH
LESTER H. PERSELLS
HUD

I had a conference with Les Persells, HUD, and the following items were discussed:

1. Selected six cities - Birmingham, 341,000 population; Macon, Georgia, 70,000 population; Asheville, North Carolina, 60,000 population; Paris, Kentucky, 18,000 population; Corinth, Mississippi, 7,000 population; and Louisville, Georgia, 2,500 population. In addition to the cities in which we are working informally - Fort Lauderdale, Florida, 84,000 population; Charlotte, North Carolina, 202,000 population, these six cities will form the basis of SRC's Urban Planning Project. Although it will be impossible for SRC staff adequately to handle this many projects it is felt that the items of action will not come up all at one time and we can keep things moving.

2. I expressed very positively my doubts on Birmingham as a good town. This is based on my knowledge of their leadership and action in the past.

3. HUD to write capsule set-up on each city.

4. SRC is at present collecting data.

5. Staff coop conference to be established as soon as the capsule reports are sent to Smith, and this coop conference will establish procedure for the future.

6. Miss Bresler to study site.

7. Proceed with action.

Conference with Dennis Carr, Community Organization Officer
Urban Renewal Division, HUD
July ~~22~~ 15, 1966

(Miss) Susan Bresler, Urban Planner
Urban Planning Project

Met briefly with Dennis Carr. He told me about the current Manpower Task Force that can be called in to prevent a "long hot summer" situation. The task force consists of representatives from OEO, Department of Labor, and HEW. The task force analyzes the racial situation and may speed up a pending Federal program, if this would help the situation. Or the task force may decide to shelve a program.

Dennis also told me about the Federal executive board here in Atlanta. This board now has a technical board to coordinate anti-poverty programs with the other Federal agencies.

Dennis says the Community Action Programs have helped pursuade welfare agencies of the effectiveness of dispersing their services in order to reach the poor. CAP's also encourage other services that can prevent the need for welfare services; for example, home management courses. CAP's have had to hire some social workers of their own because of the failure of welfare agencies to reach the very people they are intended to serve. Dennis wonders why the Federal government doesn't require welfare agencies to disperse their services. The Federal government does require, after all, professional qualifications for social workers. Why not also require dispersed locations for welfare offices?

CAP's have a referral service for the poor. "Referral" should, at the very least, mean taking the client over to the agency that can help him. At best, "referral" should mean providing the needed service right there in the neighborhood center. Referral should not mean sending the client across town to another office. The client may not even be able to afford the bus fare.

CAP's organize block groups and neighborhood councils. These groups meet at the neighborhood center to discuss what't wrong and to decide what they need. The purpose of the Community Action Program is twofold: 1) to organize the poor, so that they can express their needs, and 2) to bring the needed to services to the neighborhood center where they will be available to the poor.

Cities (and counties) should recognize that they can save money in the long run through the preventive effects of dispersed services. This will be true even while the proportion of Federal funds to CAP's will get lower in future years.

Susan Bresler

Impressions-Fort Lauderdale-July 17 to 24, 1966

Background-Fort Lauderdale

Fort Lauderdale is a unique community. Unique because its basic industry is the tourist trade. The city has a lot of wealthy retirees. The population has tripled, from 50,000 to 150,000, since World War II. Negroes make up about 1/6 of the population. Almost one-third of the families in Broward County are in the poverty income bracket.

The city and county officials are mainly business people who have lived there for many years. Instead of having an "invisible government," the power structure and the local officials are virtually one and the same. The leadership is very conservative. The Fort Lauderdale public housing board is made up of real estate interests. The Broward County School board has no educators. Heads of county health, welfare, and schools are on the anti-poverty board.

There is a pervasive unwritten system of practices to deny the Negroes their share of health, welfare, school, housing, and job opportunities. No Negroes are employed in the city's water or fire departments. The public housing is segregated. 85% of Negro pupils attend all-Negro schools. Building codes are not enforced in Negro neighborhoods. Bi-Racial Advisory Boards exist in name only.

Organization of the Negro Community

NAACP is the only significant force in the Fort Lauderdale Negro community. It has six active members and $15 in the treasury. NAACP has only been active since Rev. George came a year and a half ago. Before that, Eulah Johnson dominated the dying group with her own self-interest. NAACP's main concern has been with school desegregation in Broward County.

Negroes are confined to the northwest section of the city. Only 10% of them turned out to vote in the last election. Fort Lauderdale has 24,000 Negroes.

Don Hallock is the most active in NAACP. He began by registering Negroes for the last presidential election. He has written letters to the newspapers complaining of poor coverage of racial issues. He complained to HEW of school segregation. He led pickets of the school board. He cooperates actively with Jim Hibben, urban renewal director.

Urban Renewal

The idea of urban renewal in Fort Lauderdale came about by accident. It seems the planners were looking into the requirements for Federally aided public housing back in 1961. And they discovered the city had to have a Workable Program. The Workable Program is also required for urban renewal. The planners mistakenly concluded that the city had to have urban renewal in order to get public housing.

A year and a half ago the city decided to finance a survey and plan of the northwest area. The city used only local funds. Jim Hibben took the $12,000 a year job as Urban Renewal Director because he likes a good fight.

Jim Hibben made exhaustive efforts to win support for urban renewal. He gave over a hundred presentations of a slide talk on the urban renewal plans and their cost. His staff canvassed the northwest area in an effort to involve tenants and homeowners in the renewal plans. He worked closely with the NAACP committee on urban renewal, headed by Father Jones.

The Chamber of Commerce

According to Charles Fletcher, Chairman of the Urban Renewal Agency and executive of prosperous Burdine's department Store, the Chamber of Commerce (Greater Fort Lauderdale) has supported urban renewal from the beginning. Fletcher volunteers that he doesn't want any more Negro customers for Burdine's but that his work with the Urban Renewal Agency is only out of love.

The Chamber of Commerce supports urban renewal to be financed by local funds. But if this is not feasible, then the Chamber supports renewal with the aid of Federal funds.

The main interest of the Chamber of Commerce is bringing industry to Fort Lauderdale. Year round employment would be a blessing to the migrant farm laborers and longshoremen in the area whose work is seasonal. But there is no communication between the Chamber and the people who might get the new jobs. Negroes feel that the possible new jobs would not be for them. They've been too long conditioned to seeing jobs advertised and, when they go to apply, there is no job for them. This is why Negroes haven't flocked to the suddenly open doors of the City, where so long they have been turned away.

The Federal funds issue

The objection of Fort Lauderdale leaders to Federal funds in the schools is the same as the objection in urban renewal. What they say is the Federal government will tell you what to think. What they mean is they don't want integration. It's not so bad in the hospitals because, when the Federal official comes to check for civil rights compliance, you just shuffle the beds around so it looks like the hospital is integrated. But it isn't so easy to shuffle pupils around. And if low income housing were available to whites and Negroes on the same basis, it would be very difficult for owners of Negro real estate to continue charging Negroes higher rentals and higher purchase prices than whites.

Urban renewal in Fort Lauderdale without Federal funds would serve to continue discrimination in housing. With Federal funds, Negroes would get a fair program. The City wanted a referrendum on whether to have Federal funds supposedly because there were so many objections to Federal aid. The referrendum would kill urban renewal. And, as Al Hastings pointed out, the referrendum would in fact be a racial issue.

Perhaps pressure from NAACP had some effect. In any case, the City Attorney discovered that a referrendum at this time would be illegal. The City adopted an urban renewal law that first requires the plan be reviewed by the planning commission and by the Council. There would not be time to have a referrendum by August 30th, so the referrendum was postponed indefinitely.

The NAACP name

Charles Fletcher feels he cannot win support for renewal without strong support from the Negro community. One way to achieve this apparent support, he felt, was to have a name that signified support from the whole northwest neighborhood, instead of the NAACP committee on urban renewal. Fletcher feels the NAACP names suggests the work of a few outsiders, rather than the will of the Fort Lauderdale Negro community.

But Negroes feel that NAACP is the only strong force they have. For one thing, there is a perennial problem of Negro leadership. And that is, that so often Negro "leaders" don't speak out for the Negroes. When the School Board selected a Negro principal, they chose the one who would not speak out rather than one who was qualified to do the job. Negro "leaders" are afraid. Rev. George made a point of this.

Second, Negroes need a single voice. Jim Hibben formed the Homeowner's Association with the intention of increasing Negro support. But he segmented that support. NAACP fears that other groups may still be formed and the original group disgarded. Father Jones, Chairman of the NAACP committee on urban renewal, was alienated because he and members of his congegation were not invited to the Homeowner's meetings.

So, if the NAACP name is a stigma to the white community, it is a point of strength to the Negro community. To change the name or form additional separate groups is a betrayal.

Conflicts over the canal scheme

To Father Jones and Al Hastings the canal scheme is a quality plan, the basic scheme somehow inferior. To Mr. Haygood and to the homeowners the canal scheme creates too many problems. If the land next to a man's home is raised, won't the water drain onto his property? Mr. Haygood feels the canal along the railroad tracks is not a buffer, but a wall that isolates the neighborhood. Many feel the canals will be a maintenance problem. This is also the objection of the white leaders.

Homeowners also prefer the basic scheme because it is less expensive. So, it might have a better chance of being adopted by the city. That the canal scheme was intended to solve the drainage problem and create valuable waterfront property seems to be overshadowed by these other problems.

Mr. Haygood felt that a canvass should have been made of the people in the northwest area. There was one. What evolved was a slowly growing homeowner's group and no response from tenants. Mr. Haygood felt it would be wise to consult businessmen in the northwest area on redevelopment. But for those whose business is the sale of liquor, they don't want renewal. They probably wouldn't be able to get another liquor license. And one of them owns slum property.

Negro leaders wonder if anything is going to happen with renewal after all these years. The two schemes proposed seem but a way to prolong action. Nothing seems definite.

The role of SRC

Consultation by the Southern Regional Council added strength to the efforts of NAACP toward renewal. The presence of SRC drew the attention of city officials. And the advice on the schemes helped the local people clarify their thoughts. But there was one problem. The advice of a professional tends either to be ignored, as it was by the homeowners, or taken as law. The canal scheme became good and the basic scheme bad. This is part of the larger misunderstanding and confusion that surrounds the urban renewal effort.

Conclusions

Public Information

Federal programs. It's one thing for the conservative white leadership to object to Federal funds. But it's another thing when these people make false claims about Federal control. The only way to fight them is with the facts. And the facts should be publicized. A common fallacy in Fort Lauderdale that could be dispelled quickly is that the Federal government tells the local schools what to teach.

Urban renewal. Many people living in the renewal area didn't know what renewal was, didn't understand it. They didn't understand the timing, didn't know what would happen to their homes, didn't know how the plan could be modified. The canvass that was made needed publicity; so did the formation of the homeowner's group. The technical aspects of the canal scheme needed explanation. A grass roots type of publication might have helped. Some general information on renewal could be distributed. Neighborhood meetings on a regular basis might help. Whatever the public information program, it should be thorough and should have a full-time person on the staff. If this is impossible, perhaps volunteers from the neighborhood could help.

Community organization

Along with public information for urban renewal, there should be a neighborhood organization in the renewal area. The urban renewal staff could not undertake a thorough community organization effort on top of all its other duties. A Community Action group could do the job if it had the funds and staff. Or some other agency with trained people. A solid neighborhood organization is one of the best ways of getting information across.

The renewal neighborhood should have only one organization. Whatever its name, the group should remain intact. Any new groups that form should be incorporated in the original group.

Housing

Housing for low income groups should tie in with other improvement programs: care of the home, adult education, job opportunities. Many people felt the effort toward improved housing was rather futile without the hope of a better job (and hence, ability to pay for better housing).

Home ownership should be made more widely available. Because home ownership gives the incentive for better home care, more interest in the neighborhood, and, in turn, more interest in other improvement programs.

People who serve on boards like public housing and urban renewal should have a vested interest in serving the poor. If instead they are real estate people, for example, they will manipulate the policies of the board to serve their own interests. In the case of public housing, such people will not permit a backlog of applications to accumulate because that would mean more public housing. And the public housing competes with their slum dwellings.

Events during the week

City Commission meeting

The City Attorney told the City Commission they could not have a referrendum at this time because of the set procedure they must follow under the local urban renewal law. The Urban Renewal Agency submitted its report, not the final plan, to the City. The Agency must submit its final plan. This has to be reviewed by the planning and zoning board. Then it goes to the City Commission for approval. At that time, the City holds a public hearing on the plan. The City Attorney emphasized the public hearing. Perhaps the referrendum will not be held at all.

School Board meeting

The school board chartered a plane to Washington to meet with Mr. Kruger of HEW in Congressman Paul Rogers' office. A few days before this meeting, Kruger called Don Hallock and asked him to arrange a meeting in Fort Lauderdale. This was in answer to a request that Kruger come down. But Al Hastings says Kruger was going to come down anyway if the school beard did not comply with the civil rights law.

The school board managed to fill the afternoon with business. But at the very last minute Al Hastings told them that Kruger was coming down the next Tuesday and that their trip to Washington was an exercise in futility. When Don Hallock told them that Kruger had called him in answer to an NAACP request, they were infuriated.

Kruger told Don Hallock confidentially that HEW was being pressured by two Florida Congressmen.

Publicity

The Monday evening (July 18) newscast on Channel 4 showed me walking in the northwest neighborhood and showed the people there. But there were no shots in the film where I was talking with the people, face to face.

The July 20th newspaper article describes the City Commission meeting discussion of urban renewal.

The Friday night (July 22) newscast on Channel 7 described Southern Regional Council's project. Then I told how Pompano was going to have more riots; Fort Lauderdale could be next; and that urban renewal was a chance to build good race relations between the white and Negro communities.

Also, an article appeared in Tuesday's paper where Don Hallock defends Federal funds. Jim Hibben and I helped him.

Impressions - Louisville, Ga. July 31 to August 3, 1966

Background-Louisville

Louisville is a small rural community of about 2500 people. It's history is over 200 years old. In the center of the main business street stands a slave market built in 1758.

Attitudes toward Negroes have been slow to change. Genuine integration exists only in Louisville's new industries. Communication between whites and Negroes can be described as fearful and sporadic.

The town's economy suffers from a gap in the working age group of the population. Older people are putting their children through college and don't have money to invest in the community. They don't want to pay more taxes; they can't afford "urban" standards; and they are reluctant to change.

Discussions of urban renewal with both white and Negro leaders inevitable leads back to school desegregation problems. Jefferson County is 57% Negro.

The same people appear in several leadership positions. And many of the community leaders are relatives.

The Negro community

The civil rights movement in general and the efforts of Mr. Dons, Augusta, in the Council on Human Relations in particular helped the Negroes of Jefferson County to start to overcome their fear of the white man and to speak up for their rights. A few years ago, Mayor Buchanon, Rufus Wrens, who is an owner of Negro property and man chairman of the anti-poverty board, Negro leader Odell Hannah, and others formed a bi-racial committee or board. But nothing ever came of it. The committee is inactive.

There are two active Negro organizations that work together in Jefferson County: the Citizens League and a combined NAACP-SCLC. The Citizens League endorses candidates for the Negro block vote. Negroes in the county bring their problems to the Citizens League. Then the League contacts the government agency that is involved in the problem, be it the County Commissioners, City Council, or whatever. If further action is necessary, the Citizens League tells NAACP-SCLC. Of course, the membership in the two groups overlaps.

NAACP and SCLC are informally combined in the county. Last year they brought in SCOPE (a part of SCLC) and conducted a peaceful, successful voter registration campaign. There was no violence in Jefferson County. The FBI and the police were copperative. The success of the campaign helped make more Negroes willing to participate in civil rights activities. Further efforts resulted in a Negro deputy sheriff, and Negro policman in Louisville, and desegregated restaurants.

Of the current battles, school desegregation is the most important. Last year there was token integration in the classrooms. This year, all but two white classes will have Negro pupils. But the faculty is not yet integrated. School board chiarman Jim Abbott says they've gone as far as they can go and will lose their Federal funds for a year. If the faculty is not integrated this fall, NAACP-SCLC plans to picket.

"Something Old-- Something New"

Louisville, the county seat of Jefferson County, Georgia, is located in the heart of Dixie's cotton belt. Though cotton is the chief product of the farming area, Louisville has modern stores, a fertilizer plant, a freezer locker plant, cottonseed oil mills, cotton gins, Thermo King Corp., a J. P. Stevens plant, an up to date printing plant, a garment factory, to furnish steady, year 'round employment. Louisville is also the hub city of several excellent highways and has good hotel accommodations and an AAA motel.

Here in Louisville, you can enjoy the advantages of a large city, and yet appreciate living in one of Georgia's most interesting small towns. For example, this little city has a municipally owned golf course, a playground for your children, a modern motion picture theatre and many recreational facilities, including fine hunting and fishing.

Louisville cordially invites you to make your home here—to locate your plant here. But if you can't do either, please stop with us for a pleasant visit!

Louisville, deep in the heart of Dixie —an old town, but with every new, modern convenience.

Louisville, Georgia

THE FIRST PERMANENT CAPITAL OF GEORGIA (1794 to 1807)

Louisville, First Permanent Capital

Louisville was the first permanent capital of Georgia. A capitol building, a Governor's mansion, and many residents were built in Louisville before the population moved in.

The town was the seat of the state government from 1794 to 1807, and was designated as the capital before there was a street or any houses.

The colonists who settled at Savannah and founded the State of Georgia were timid about pressing further inland and in an effort to encourage the settlement of the interior a commission of men was selected to choose a place far from the coast where a permanent capitol could be built.

The Site Chosen

The three man commission was sent inland to choose site for the new city. They were instructed to find a location amidst peace-loving and friendly Indians; a place where there was good drinking water; and a high place "far above the unhealthy swampy vapors." That the commission chose well is shown by the fact that Louisville had no serious difficulties with the Indians. The water supply here, when the town was dependent on artesian wells, was always the best. The health record of the town is excellent and it is noted that every approach to the town is up-grade.

"The Sidewalks of Louisville"

The streets of Louisville did not "just grow." By legislative enactment it was decreed that the streets in the new town should be laid off "after the style of the streets of Philadelphia. This early plan accounts in part for the wide, shady streets that lie at right angles and not helter-skelter. The streets were numbered and named before the town was populated.

Louisville was built near Galphin's Old Town, a settlement believed to have antedated the coming of Oglethorpe. This trading post was established by George Galphin, a prosperous Indian trader, who took up a large tract of land in what was then St. George's Parish, now Jefferson County.

The Yazoo Fraud

Many stirring events marked the early days of Louisville, but none had so wide consequences as the Yazoo matter.

At that time the State of Georgia embraced all that tract of land now the states of Mississippi and Alabama. The legislature voted to sell about 35 million acres of this unsettled territory for a half a million dollars, which was about one and a half cents per acre. This acreage was called the Yazoo Tract, because it embraced the Yazoo river, tributary to the Mississippi. When the people realized what a fraud this land sale was, they were indignant and demanded the repeal of the Yazoo Act.

James Jackson, U. S. Senator from Georgia, resigned his post in Washington to return to the state to lead the fight for repeal of the act.

When the legislature met in the new capitol at Louisville in January, 1796, one of its first deeds who to pass the Rescinding Act, declared that "The last legislature, not confining itself to the powers with which that body was constitutionally invested did usury a power to pass the obnoxious act, contrary to the constitutional authority and repugnant to the democratical form of government of the State."

Not only did the body declare the Yazoo Act null and void, but ordered it removed from all public records of the State. Two days after the passage of the rescinding act, the members assembled outside the capitol building and in solemn ceremony burned the infamous Yazoo Act by "fire from heaven," which was called down by the simple means of a sunglass.

Named for French King

Louisville was named for Louis XVI of France in appreciation for military help given the colony by the French people during the American Revolution.

On "March to the Sea"

When Sherman made his famous "March to the Sea," in 1864, Gen. Slocum and his troops made Louisville their headquarters. They paused long enough to burn the business section, and many of the old landmarks and records. Two of the few buildings left were the Old Market and the residence used by the General as headquarters.

Seal Adopted

The famous constitutional convention of 1798 was held in Louisville and it was at this convention that the constitution was adopted under which the State of Georgia functioned for seventy years. It was at Louisville that the State Legislature met in June 1799 and adopted the great Seal of State. This seal adopted at Louisville, except for a brief period during Reconstruction Days, has been in constant use from that day, to this, thus linking the Georgia of today with the Georgia of the 18th Century.

The Market House

One building in Louisville really antedates the town itself. That building is the Old Market House. The market house was the scene of all public sales, of course slaves were sold there preceeding the War Between the States, but in the old days this quaint old square building, there in the middle of the main street in Louisville was called the Market House. Made of great heavy timbers, the original structure is still intact, though tradition says that it is older than the town and was built in 1758 at the convergence of two important Indian trails, one running west from the coast, the other inland north and south.

Louisville Academy

Louisville Academy, founded in 1796, is one of the ten original institutions chosen to make up the University system of Georgia. The University of Georgia was established at the site later known as Athens, while Louisville was the state capital. Louisville Academy was built on a land grant of several hundred acres, and to this day Louisville Academy holds deeds to a part of the original land grant.

The Old Bell

Hanging in the old Market House is an old bell, cast in France in 1772. The bell was designed for a convent in Louisiana, but the French boat on which the bell was shipped was sacked by pirates. The pirate ship was in turn captured near Savannah, and later the bell was sent inland to the new state capital.

The bell was rung to assemble the settlers when the Indians were uprising. It was also rung in celebration of the Independence of the Thirteen Colonies.

Another current battle is to try to get a Negro appointed to the County Welfare board.

Urban renewal in Louisville is still another battle. Negroes want to find out what's happening: what is holding the project up? should they go ahead and build a new home somewhere else? There will be a meeting of neighborhood residents and urban renewal officials later this month.

According to NAACP, W.E.Price, a high school principal, is an Uncle Tom. He won't let Negro teachers participate in political or civil rights activities. The local NAACP president calls Price the worst man in the county. Price is active in the Red Cross and the Lakeview Country Club, but he will not take part in civil rights activities. He was reluctant to endorse the Headstart program until it was already accepted. He fools a lot of Negroes and so has a large following. And he is very popular with the white leadership. Odell Hannah says Price wants integration for himself but not for other Negroes.

Odell Hannah, a building contractor, is the most active leader. White leaders speak of him in negative tones as "militant." Despite his 6th grade education, Hannah has a pretty good business. I think the man has a fine mind and is a good organizer. Hannah makes forthright demands of local officials. At times, other Negroes have let him down: once, when he approached the City Council, and another time during the voter registration campaign. But each success makes the Negroes braver.

Urban Renewal

Sidney Carter, a planning consultant in Augusta, did planning studies for Louisville. He suggested urban renewal and suggested the Beech Street area be the first project. The area is compact and could be valuable property. It will be used for residential purposes. A public housing project will be built adjacent to the project area.

Alton Spells and Roy Fleming are on the minoirty subcommittee of the Citizens Advisory Committee. Several months ago they made a survey of the Beech Street area. They have not been contacted since. There has been no effort as yet to inform the residents of the renewal area about the project or about their rights under urban renewal.

Mr. Easterlin, the part-time Urban Renewal Director, is concerned over the affect of slums on potential industries. He is also concerned over the elderly people in the project area who own their own homes. These people will not get enough money fortheir property to build a standard house. They can, however, get a long-term, low-interest loan from the Farmers Home Administration. But they don't want to go into debt.

Mrs. Rosa Green, Administrative Assistant to Easterlin, says the city had to be sold and resold on the idea of renewal. One of the prohibitive factors is the cost. The city recently passed a $35,000 bond issue to finance a new airport. The cost to the city of the proposed renewal project is estimated at $100,000.

As required by the Workable Program (which is required for public housing), the city has a codes compliance program. But

City-appointed Joe Cox, brother of City Administrator Mike Cox, is not likely to enforce housing and building codes any more than necessary to recertify the Workable Program. So, white landlords will continue to neglect their Negro tenant property. And Rufus Wrens will continue to supply poor Negroes with makeshift shacks on unimproved land. And outside the city limits, there are no codes at all.

Renewal and the Anti-Poverty Program

The only proposed cooperation between the urban renewal program and the anti-poverty program is for a recreation center in the project area. The CAP could staff the recreation facility. The Jefferson County CAP just received $132,000 in July for administration, supplus commodities, home management aides, and employment counseling and development. So, both programs are new.

The 13-county Central Savannah River Area Planning and Development Commission (CSRA) began providing local planning assistance in February and employed Mr. Starnes. Starnes is writing articles on urban renewal for Mr. Easterlin to give to the press. I asked Mr. Starnes if he would encourage cooperation with the anti-poverty program. He said no. CSRA once had an anti-poverty program. But it failed. Starnes feels anti-poverty programs can be good if they're administered properly. But he is so concerned over the prestige of CSRA, that he will not mention anti-poverty programs publicly in any way.

The role of SRC

SRC can be helpful to Louisville's urban renewal program in two ways: one, we can provide encouragement to the tirelessly struggling Negroes in Jefferson County and point out to them that they have certain rights under urban renewal; and two, we can provide professional assistance to both the officials and the residents of the renewal neighborhood.

Events during visit

I met with Odell Hannah, Alton Spells, Roy Fleming, and Prof. Shinhoster and told them they could call a meeting of the neighborhood residents in the Beech Street Project and the urban renewal officials to find out the facts. Without mentioning my name, they asked Mr. Easterlin to call the meeting. It will be held later this month.

Conclusions:

Public information on Federal programs before they are applied for. Television, radio, simplified literature, public meetings, and surveys all can be used. There should be discussion with the Negro community. Negroes should be involved and represented.

The Beech Street renewal area may not have been the best place to start slum clearance in Louisville, since there were many homeowners over 65 in this project area who didn't want to go into debt on a new home, even though Farmers Home Administration loans are available. Earlier discussion might have helped.

Rent subsidy to the poor. Without the subsidy, shacks and slums will continue to be built; sewers will not be provided; building and housing codes will not be enforced; and there will not be enough public housing to replace the shacks. Perhaps the recipient of a rent subsidy could be required to participate in an education and/or job training program to help him raise his income level.

The rent subsidy will indirectly be paying for (the property taxes that pay for) streets and sewers. So, this program might alleviate some of the need for Federally aided water and sewer grants and loans. At the same time, the Federal funds that will be paying for water and sewer facilities in a community will be used to serve the Negro neighborhoods as well as the white.

Mr. W.F. Easterlin, Jr., President, First National Bank
Urban Renewal Director, part-time
President, Chamber of Commerce member, Planning Commission
Louisville representative to CSRA
Chairman, Hospital Authority

Mr. Easterlin is a native of Americus, Ga. He came to live in Louisville since it's his wife's hometown. He inherited the job of Urban Renewal Director from his brother-in-law, attorney James Abbott. Abbott is chairman of the Jefferson County School Board.

Mrs. Saxon, 30 years editor of the conservative weekly, "The News and Farmer," is on the Chamber of Commerce board. Her neice, Mrs. Rosa Green, is administrative assistant to Mr. Easterlin.

Easterlin boasts of the city's new airport and adjacent industrial park. Westinghouse, the largest employer, has 400 workers; J.P.Stevens & Co., 2000; and the "stitching plant", 200. These are integrated. Seeking new industry seems to be Mr. Easterlin's favorite topic. He comments that the Chamber of Commerce was careful not to let the potential industry representatives see the city's slums, or, shacks, as he put it. I think he said 40% of the city's housing is dilapidated, another 20% substandard, and The need for renewal is evident.

Easterlin feels the city is conservative and reluctant to move on renewal programs. He commented that the city got by with doing nothing in the first year of the survey and planning stage and that, now in the second year, they must make it work. The citizen advisory committee has not been active. There have been no meetings yet with residents of the project area. No articles in the local paper on renewal yet. But Easterlin says both these things will take place.

Citing the community's Negro leadership, Easterlin names high school principal W.E. Price as head of the conservative faction. Easterlin thinks Price is a fine person. And then there's the more militant faction, headed by the Hannah brothers, Odell and Ozie. Last year they brought a very effective (SCOPE) voter registration project into the county. The brothers are also responsible for the agreement of restaurant owners to serve Negroes and for a Negro on the police force and a Negro Deputy Sherriff. The Hannah brothers operate a contracting business. They may have to liquidate some of their assets in order to repay a loan to Mr. Easterlin's bank.

Homeowners who are relocated from the renewal area can get Farm Home Administration loans--since Louisville is a rural community under 5500--to build new homes. But Negroes don't like to go into debt, Easterlin says. He and his wife have had arguments about uprooting Negroes from their homes. His wife doesn't approve.

Mr. Easterlin feels it's important to give Negroes their fair share of community services and shakes his head at how the others (city officials) don't realize . . . (how discrimination affects the Negroes). Easterlin seemed receptive to a visit from the Southern Regional Council, particularly by a planner, since they don't know what it's all about. (Who does?)

Jimmy Polhill, III
Chairman, Citizens Advisory Committee
brother of Mrs. Rosa Green, Administrative Assistant to Urban Renewal Director son of Jim Polhill, first chairman of the Jefferson County Community Action board nephew of Mrs. Saxon, editor of weekly newspaper, "The News and Farmer"

Mr. Polhill opened the conversation with . . . You know the problem in a small town ? The manpower problem. We meet each other coming out of meetings and going to meetings.

Next, he described the five Citizen Advisory Committee meetings he had planned for the coming year. He felt the first step was to educate the advisory committee on urban renewal, and the next step, to educate the people in the community. I asked whether the Urban Renewal Representative, Sam Agee, was helpful in explaining urban renewal. Mr. Polhill commented that Sam Agee uses terms and initials unfamiliar to the layman.

Polhill said nearly every high school graduate and all college graduates had left Louisville for the past twenty years. They were unable to find jobs in town. Because the young working age people were gone, there was no interest (money) in investing in the community. The older adults were using their money to send their children to college. Louisville, he felt,could not afford good standards, such as improved lots, The city has no recreation to speak of. And most of the work of running the city is done by volunteers.

I gave Mr. Polhill a pamphlet on the Southern Regional Council. Just the word 'Council' was enough to set him off. He immediately classified me as just another civil rights worker. He was hostile toward me and toward civil rights workers in general for condemning him for the sins of his grandfather. He didn't feel he was responsible for the situation of Negroes today. He said if your grandfather was a horsethief, does that make you one? He felt that the solution to race relations problems would take time. He recalled in the span of his forty years when there was once no Negro school at all, until there was a school but no busses, until finally there were enough busses to transport the pupils to the Negro school.

He said we've put the problem off as long as we could. We used to deal with Negro problems through extermination. We have practically exterminated the Indians. Short of extermination, we'll have to deal with the problem. He told how new industries in the Louisvlle area had brought integration on the job. But when it comes to the schools, he feels that is a moral problem. He would hate to see integration in the schools. Why, I asked. He said if we comply with total integration at once, the quality of education would go down. The proportion of Negroes to whites in the schools would be two to one. Negroes, he said, would set the standards.

They'll dominate the extracurricular activities. They're the best dancers, the best musicians, the best athletes, and the worst students. Polhill was concerned with Negro morals, partiuclarly the family institution. I think he was also concerned that Negroes would be very popular . He said they're so amiable, so easy-going--you read about where it ain't so, but it is--so pleasant. He felt, if the schools were integrated at once, that his eight year old daughter couldn't stand the pressure.

Polhill wondered what you can expect of city government? The small rural community, he said, can't afford such standards as subdivision regulations, building codes, paved streets, and all the utilities. I mentioned that Federal programs require as little as ten percent participation by the locality. Yes, he said, but with so many programs, Louisville has already taxed itself to the hilt.

Mr. Polhill's father spearheaded Jefferson County's Community Action Program. The elder is interested in training the poor for jobs in new industries. The younger Polhill said his family had been branded as Negger-lovers in Louisville and had been ostracized. How would you like to be branded a Negger-lover? he said. You walk into a room full of people and everyone stops talking.

Polhill felt that communication with Negro leaders is important and that informing the public is important. The era of operating in the dark is gone, he said. We've got to inform the public, so we can get public support.

Five years ago if Negroes walked into a meeting of whites, there'd have bee a riot. Now, nobody objects, but nobody greets 'em either. I was presiding at such a meeting and I wouldn't greet 'em, for selfish reasons. I beleive he was afraid of what his friends and business associates would say.

He said it was a big step putting Negroes on the advisory committee. And there'll have to be more Negroes on it before we're through, if the committee is to be representative.

Polhill says he fears the Negroes. He fears associating with them. Why do I have this fear? he asks. Why doesn't the Southern REgional Council find out why there is this fear? There must be a reason. Before we can communicate, we have to get over this fear. I figure in about two years we'll have better communitcation.

A Modest Proposal

WASHINGTON

The problem of the cities, in the form that it is now assuming, is the most urgent, the most difficult and the most frightening American domestic problem that has emerged in all the years of this country's history since the Civil War.

As a sort of farewell before a month's vacation, an attempt will, therefore, be made to sum up the problem, as it now stands, in a series of three reports. The only way to begin is with the terrible words of the general confession: "We have left undone those things which we ought to have done, and we have done those things which we ought not to have done."

This includes, first of all, the almost complete failure to find out and to face the hard facts of the modern urban problem. The heart of the problem of the cities is the problem of the Negro ghettos which have been flaming into riot in recent deeks.

To begin with, you cannot "end de facto segregation" in an urban school system when the entire school system is already de facto segregated. Yet some people are still mouthing this slogan here in the District of Columbia where public elementary schools are now 91 per cent Negro!

To go on with, short of a constitutional amendment, you could not even end de facto segregation by forcibly homogenizing all the schools in an urban school system that was only 30 per cent Negro. The careful research behind the Watts report shows that any school which is forced to accept as much as 25 per cent of disadvantaged children virtually ceases to be a school; and almost all the children of the ghettos are very seriously disadvantaged.

Race has nothing to do with the effect on the school. The school becomes worthless because the teachers are unable to carry the huge extra burden of helping their disadvantaged pupils — whether they are Negro or Mexican-American or poor white. And when the neighborhood school goes to hell in a hack, all the middle and lower-middle income families in the neighborhood simply pick up and move to the suburbs, thereby creating another wholly segregated school.

Since an amendment forbidding such movement is unlikely, the important thing is not to "end de facto segregation." The important thing is to provide many more teachers, and much better teachers, for all schools carrying a serious burden of disadvantaged pupils. But there is no money to do that. Nothing for schools, and billions upon billions for freeways and expressways that promote the white emigration to the suburbs! That has been our rule for many years, again recalling the terrible sentence from the general confession.

The result is the present situation. This situation is not generally understood, yet the new SNCC leader, Stokely Carmichael, clearly understood it well enough when he boasted to a recent Washington rally that "We'd have black power" in most of the big American cities "within six years."

Six years is too short an interval, but school figures and population figures unanswerably indicate that most of the really major American cities are likely to have Negro majorities within the next decade, if not sooner. This is partly because of the growth of the ghettos, but the main cause is the flight to the suburbs of virtually all white families with children of school age.

Unless present trends are reversed, in short, most of our great cities are due to become huge Negro reservations — a series of super-Watts areas! When and if that happens, "black power" will no doubt be installed in city hall. But when and if that happens, as any practical-minded man can foresee, there will be other consequences, too.

The change in the cities will not only accelerate the white movement to the suburbs until the city centers truly are reservations in the grimmest sense of that grim word. This change will also, and above all, accelerate another movement that has already begun without anyone paying much attention.

Finance and business, industry and commerce will follow the flight into the suburbs; all the vast national investment in the centers will quite suddenly be almost worthless. And far worse still, these city-sized super-Watts areas of the future will have hardly more resources of their own to solve their problems than the Watts district of Los Angeles has today.

If we do not change the trend, there will be no hope of integration, no hope of equality for the Negro Americans. There will be an immense increase of the ugly race feeling that the riots have already begun to promote. There could even be, one day, a President Verwoerd in the White House. Any effort, any expenditure, any personal or national sacrifice will be better than the thing we are threatened with, whites and Negroes together.

The Macon News. Wed. aft Aug. 3, 1966

Susan Bresler

Impressions - Macon, Ga. - August 3 to 5, 1966

Introductory remarks

I didn't spend a whole lot of time in Macon because the urban renewal program was well underway, appeared thorough and successful, and because everyone I talked to seemed pleased with the program. So, this report will mainly tell how they did it--how the urban renewal staff made the program work.

Background of community - "Macon on the Move"

Macon has 125,000 people. The city's economy is based on trade; manufacturing, particularly textiles; and nearby Robins Air Force Base. Mayor Merritt is a full-time mayor. He's a self-sufficient businessman. He was progressive two terms ago but evidently didn't start off close enough to the people. Wilson defeated Merritt, then proceeded to carry out Merritt's ideas. Now Merritt is back in office, closer to the people, and continuing progressive leadership.

To show you what I mean by progressive, Merritt recently got a public housing project through that will be located right between white and Negro neighborhoods. All the existing public housing projects are segregated. This project has a good chance of being integrated.

Mayor Merritt is also chairman of the local Community Action board. Negro leader Lewis Wynne gives the mayor most of the credit for the City's progressive outlook. I think this forward-looking attitude influenced the urban renewal program.

Organization of the Negro community

The Bibb County Co-ordinating Committee is the local voter's league. This group and NAACP work together closely. Lewis Wynne and Bill Randall are in several businesses together. One of them is the Macon Weekly that Bill Randall edits. The paper told of local ministers picketing the supermarkets until the stores agreed to employ Negroes and to employ them in supervisory positions. The picketing (and boycott) were successful. Both Randall and Wynne are on the Community Action board.

Urban Renewal

Macon has three urban renewal projects: Tybee, Ocmulgee, and Coliseum. Tybee is about completed. The area is next to existing industry and was cleared for industrial reuse. The city wanted to put in public housing so the people living there could be close to their jobs. But PHA and FHA wouldn't allow public housing adjacent to industry.

Coliseum project involves clearance for a coliseum, stadium, office park, and shopping areas. A hundred families have been relocated into standard housing. Ocmulgee project will be for residential reuse and public housing.

Assets

Three important conditions have contributed to Macon's urban renewal program: One that I've already mentioned is the progressive mayor. I forgot to say earlier that the mayor set up an active bi-racial committee; he cooperates with Negro leaders. A second important condition has been the contacts of the urban renewal staff with other public agencies. Mrs. Mary Asbell, now the Social Services Coordinator, used to work for the housing authority--the housing authority used to be the Local Public Agency that carried on urban renewal in Macon--and for the county welfare department. Before relocation began, Mrs. Asbell went around to all the public agencies and told them she would be relocating people and would need to refer them to the public agencies for help: to the welfare department for food stamps and medicare, to the health department for family planning, to the Georgia State Employment Service for jobs and vocational rehabilitation. Mrs. Asbell says, "When people understand what you're doing, they usually cooperate."

The third important condition that contributed to Macon's urban renewal program was informal coordination of the urban renewal staff with the Community Action Program. In fact, the urban renewal staff helped organize the anti-poverty program. So, while the urban renewal staff relocates people, the staff looks for children to put in the Headstart program. A staff relocation worker set up adult classes right in the urban renewal site office. And neighborhood youth corps workers help relocate people and help out in the site offices.

In addition, the renewal staff cooperates with the Rescue Mission, the Salvation Army, and even the Boy Scouts. The staff is interested in starting a clothing bank in the fall. On the citizens advisory committe, a welfare committee, composed of Negroes, appeals to Negro organizations at Christmas times to give gifts and toys to needy families. I read some case studies in the renewal office of people the staff had worked with in relocating. You could see from their stories how many people responded to the efforts of the renewal staff, not only because they were getting help, but also because they were getting attention.

Liabilities

There isn't enough standard, moderately-priced housing for Negroes in Macon. The relocation staff has been able to relocate families successfully so far, but the task is becoming more difficult. In its estimate of housing available to displaced families, the Urban Renewal Department reported 420 rental units to middle income white families; 100 rental units to middle income Nonwhite families; 375 sales units to middle income white families; but only 70 sales units to middle income Nonwhite families in Macon.

There has been no organization of or participation by the residents of the renewal areas in the urban renewal program or plans. At the same time, the residents have misunderstood the program, and the job of relocation has been difficult and time-consuming. Also, there is no 222(d)3 housing in Macon. I think if the people in the renewal neighborhoods had taken part in the renewal program, the job of relocation would have been easier. Also, the need for moderately priced housing might have been pointed out better; 221(d)3 housing might have come into the program.

Finally, the relocation workers felt unprepared for their work; they had to learn on the job. David Lucas, the relocation officer I talked to, said he wished there were a state organization of relocation workers who could get together, discuss their problems, and share solutions. One thing he said he had to learn was to stop and talk to people in the renewal area as he saw them on the street. Then they would be more receptive when he came to their homes.

Related problems

The anti-poverty program in Bibb County has been slow in getting started and even slower in setting up the most important part of the anti-poverty program, the neighborhood centers. Dave Lucas says if the neighborhood centers had been operating and had provided child care services, his staff would have been able to get many more people to attend the adult classes. But as it was, there was no way for these people to take care of their children while they were attending class.

Finally, there's the school desegregation problem. Things have been moving very slowly. The Board of Education, a self-perpetuating and autonomous body, is now acting under a court order.

Role of SRC

I think Southern Regional Council's main role in regard to Macon is to report on what the Urban Renewal Department has done and tell other communities about it.

We could experiment with distributing literature to community leaders and to renewal neighborhood leaders. The literature would tell in simple language what is involved in an urban renewal project.

Conclusions

Rent subsidy

Here are some new reasons for having the rent subsidy: 1) Some people can't even afford the $21 minimum per month for public housing. These are people over 40 who can't pass examinations to get work to supplement their fixed incomes. Their I.Q. is too low, and their only income might be social security or welfare. 2) A rent subsidy could be used to fill the gap between the time a family lives in public housing and the time they are financially able to own their own home.

Consultant to the residents of the renewal neighborhood

One thing this consultant could do is give people in the renewal area advice on negotiating for their properties.

Block groups and neighborhood organizations

Dave Lucas, the Relocation Specialist, felt block groups would help in discussing problems. He said at least once a month, meeting with a neighborhood organization would help; people in the community don't know much about urban renewal--that's the answer to a lot of questions at OEO.

At the suggestion of Dennis Carr of HUD, I visited Ed Stodgill, Intergroup Relations Officer, at OEO, to find out about the Community Action Programs (CAP's) in four of my six cities. He sent me to see the people who cover Louisville, Corinth, Macon, and Birmingham.

I talked to Hugh Lasseter about Louisville, Ga., and Macon, Ga. Louisville (Jefferson County) is just getting its CAP started. Macon's (Bibb County) CAP has been moving very slowly: there are still nowneighborhood centers. Mr. Lasseter thinks the CAP staff director has been reluctant to push new programs in Macon.

Bill Zearden, the person I would have seen about Corinth, was out of town. I talked to Bill Holland instead. He didn't know anything about Corinth.

I made an appointment to see Jim May about Birmingham. He got tied up in a meeting and couldn't make the appointment.

So far, I haven't gotten too much out of OEO.

Impressions - Corinth, Miss. - August 21 to 23, 1966

Background-Corinth

Corinth has been a go-getter for Federal programs (over 4 1/2 million dollars' worth approved between 1962 and 1966) and has conceived of community improvement on a broad and comprehensive scale: housing, job training, education, watershed development, and much more.

Why this little city of 15,000 in the poorest section of Mississippi? Two reasons: 1) ambitious Troy Norris. He lives in Corinth because his wife is from there and she doesn't want to move. Norris is about to get a Federal appointment. 2) The Federal government was, at one point, close to cutting off all aid to Mississippi. Federal agencies were eager to push their programs in a Mississippi town. Through Troy Norris they could do it.

Related to Sparkman

Corinth was once written up in the Birmingham News as "Little Chicago." It seems that the gamblers and strip show operators that were cleaned out of Phenix City, Alabama, migrated to Corinth. Alcorn County is one of six Mississippi counties that voted to remain dry in a local referendum. Bootlegging is a local industry.

The city has managed to attract some manufacturing industry in recent years. But driving into the downtown business section, Corinth looks like a sleepy little town. The buildings are old and several are vacant.

Organization of the Negro community

Corinth is 13% Negro. There is no local civil rights organization. But some local Negroes are affiliated with the state NAACP. Among them, high school principal E.S. Bishop.

Prof. Bishop acts in the old-line Negro leader manner: quiet, polite, continuous. To his credit are two Negroes on the city police force, a Negro secretary hired by the Urban Renewal Agency, recreation facilities for Negroes, and most of the 65 Negroes employed by ITT-Kellogg. (The company has a total of 870 employees and must comply with FEPC fair employment practices. The personnel manager boasts of the company's integrated office parties.)*

Prof. Bishop also gets the credit for keeping militant civil rights activities out of Corinth. Bishop and a few other influential Negroes are regularly chosen by white leaders to serve on committees dealing with minority problems.

A small group of Negroes, led by Robert U. Jones, voice impatient objections against Bishop. They feel Bishop is an Uncle Tom. They feel Bishop is not doing as much as he could. Perhaps he's not. Perhaps Bishop thinks more rapid integration would weaken his powerful position in the Negro community. But I don't think so. Certainly, Bishop has kept communication with white leaders open.

Urban Renewal

Corinth's urban renewal project had only one unpaved street. Houses had electricity and some had gas.

In a nearby neighborhood, 16 units of 221(d)3 housing sparked a revitalization of home maintainance and repair.

Here are Prof. Bishop's comments on urban renewal: Develop new housing first; don't relocate people into what could become another slum. Why couldn't Negroes be relocated into white neighborhoods of comparable income and education? Why couldn't Negroes move into white public housing? I see no reason why this couldn't be done. I wouldn't like to see any more public housing built. Negroes have more difficulty than whites in finding good housing and in finding good locations for housing.

There should be a Negro on the urban renewal board.

A subcommittee on minority housing is by definition isolated. Minority members and problems should be part of the whole citizens advisory committee. (The subcommittee on minority housing did not meet with the rest of the citizens advisory committee.)

The subcommittee needed better techniques to get the renewal area residents to participate; newspaper announcements, telephone calls, and personal contacts were not enough.

Here are Robert U. Jones'comments on urban renewal: The mayor wanted to subdivide some property near the sewage treatment area. Jones says the area was unsuitable. Bishop told him the decision was final, Jones says. And this was misleading and not true. This land was supposedly bait to get the mayor interested in urban renewal.

James Billingsley, Neighborhood Youth Corps Director, says he lives in the area where the mayor owns property and the land was suitable. The site is near sewage lagoons.

Jones says Troy Norris said his (Norris') parents would live there. They were sharecroppers and this suited their living standards. Jones feels Norris applies this standard to Negroes.

Jones says the urban renewal project was intended to take the land away from Negro residents and businessmen and crowd them into the Easom High School (Prof. Bishop's school) area. And that the project was a way to expand downtown business; Jim Billingsley agrees on this point. But he says Negroes have relocated into other areas of the city.

Jones says if the residents of the renewal area could move back into the area, he would have no complaints. He felt one unfortunate aspect of renewal was that older people with limited incomes were forced to go into debt on a new home.

Jones' main grievance is the subcommittee on minority housing. He says they're hand picked and they are the ones the whites always pick because they are cooperative. Besides, Jones had personal differences with E.S. Bishop. So, instead of taking his grievances to the subcommittee first, Jones wrote letters complaining to Federal officials.

Here are Thomas Coleman, Urban Renewal Director's, comments on the project: I wouldn't put public housing in an urban renewal project. It was too hard to relocate people. Some couhldn't even afford public housing. Several people don't like public housing, possibly, Coleman says, because Corinth's public housing isn't well maintained or the relocatees wouldn't want to live next to the people now living in public housing. In other cities, he says, people consider it an honor to get into public housing.

And here are the mayor's comments on urban renewal: I wish we'd had a Community Renewal Program before we went into the urban renewal project. For one thing, the project was total clearance. Now we know we could have rehabilitated some of the houses. We didn't have enough public housing to relocate people into. We made a financial commitment that's going to tie us up for several years. The project caused a temporary inflation in our small town real estate market: prices of property and homes went up. And people didn't know about all the programs that were available to provide decent housing.

Related programs

Seven months after Corinth got its Federal funds for the urban renewal project, the City got a Community Renewal Program (CRP) funded. Now, a CRP is usually a study of all the slums and blight in a community and the use of various Federal programs to alleviate blight. So the City's CRP proposal touched on home ownership for low income families, 221(d)3 housing, and an urban renewal booklet. But, in addition, the CRP proposal dealt with citizenship education, vocational training, regional planning and economic growth, school attendance, civil defense, soil conservation, waterway improvement, and support of the President's anti-poverty program before it was legislated.

The Urban Renewal Commission, headed by Troy Norris, was ready for the anti-poverty program and Corinth was one of the first ten cities in the country to be funded. This was before OEO guidelines came out. After the guidelines, the administering agency, called the Northeast Mississippi Economic Commission was to have acceptable representatives from each of the counties involved. The NMEC was reformed several times but never met OEO requirements. A year after it was funded, Corinth's anti-poverty program was closed.

In the meantime, a group called Corinth Community Development, Inc., also headed by Troy Norris, formed the nonprofit sponsoring agency to borrow and dispense funds for the 221(d)3 housing. This group also handled Neighborhood Youth Corps funds. These funds made it possible to buy the cars the NYC and the Urban Renewal Agency use. The cars have Northeast Mississippi Economic Commission written on the doors. Yet, the NMEC never functioned and, for all practical purposes, never existed. This part is all very confusing to me. And I'm not sure if I have it right. The Demonstration report doesn't explain it. It just says all the programs were coordinated through the Urban Renewal Commission. (What it means is Troy Norris). NYC funds also made possible a fiscal management office with data processing equipment for NYC enrollee payroll checks and records.

Has Corinth made progress?
Toward integration?

The tie-in with further Federal programs and their benefits has put pressure on local agencies to comply with the law. The Urban Renewal Agency hired a Negro relocation specialist and a Negro secretary. The Neighborhood Youth Corps hired a Negro director; half the enrollees were Negro students. The state employment division was involved with NYC, Manpower (MDTA), and On-the-Job training. All these programs required integrated staff operations. The Head Start program integrated at least one school. But the school board is having difficulties.

Yet, the public housing is still segregated. Though the housing pattern in the city is integrated overall, housing is segregated on a block by block basis. The school faculties have not integrated. Parks are still segregated.

Toward minority representation?

Representatives on minority committees are still hand picked. One encouraging sign is a Negro running for City Council. I would say that white leaders still have to be pushed for every inch the Negro is to gain toward equal opportunity.

Toward uplifting people from poverty?

The NYC has helped students remain in high school and has helped dropouts return. Work-study has helped some go on to college. On-the-job training and Manpower development training programs have provided people with work skills. Work experience has helped hard-core unemployable adults. Head Start has given motivation to youngsters before they enter school. Corinth's new industry has provided new jobs.

Toward coordinated efforts at community improvement?

How much Corinth's programs were coordinated for the individual being relocated from the urban renewal project, I don't know. Certainly, Corinth's programs were coordinated from an administrative standpoint. If Corinth's Community Action Program had been refunded, it would have provided for home management aides. These are women from the poor neighborhoods who learn to help others with homemaking. They perhaps could have also helped bring about greater participation of the residents. But when OEO did make another grant recently, it was for a Federal coordinator. Sounds like more administrative coordination.

Toward more progressive government in M ississippi?

Neighboring counties say, we need these programs: work experience, Youth Corps, Head Start. Fears of Federal control have subsided. Integration is not impossible. School principals and mayors recognize their problems of poverty and know they can do something about it. Corinth has served its purpose well of setting an example for other communities.

Two of Corinth's greatest assets are also its handicaps.

Norris, in his eagerness to push programs through and set an example in Corinth, operated not so much by informing and educating community officials and leaders, as by confusing them. So that they would leave things up to him and rely on his judgment. In this he was successful. Norris says local officals "backed off," when it came to handling programs. I think Norris confused them, and while they were trying to figure out what was going on, he forged ahead. In view of local attitudes toward Federal funds and toward urban renewal at the time, maybe this was the only way he could have done it.

The Federal government was more interested in opening up

Mississippi for Federal programs, than in the people of Corinth. Once the programs were in the state, the Federal government was eager to cut Corinth off. But then, relations between the Federal government and Mississippi were so bad,that maybe this was the best Corinth could do under the circumstances.

* The branch manager admits ITT is not doing as much as it could toward equal opportunity. He complains of his problems with poor whites who have poor housekeeping habits. All of his Negroes, he says, are clean.

Impressions-Birmingham-January 22-25, 1967

Background-Birmingham

I have as little background as anyone on the unhappy history of Birmingham. But even the newcomer couldn't miss the rows of small crowded shacks edging the city's industrial areas. And from any high place, see the puffing chimneys and smoky skies. Industries own vast tracts of land in and around the city.

Business must be good: Six new skyscrapers are going up, one of them a construction company, one a gas company. I sometimes think skyscrapers tend to make a city conscious (or guilty) of its image. At any rate, I heard someone here in the office saying Birmingham is now hiring a public relations firm to improve its image.

The mayor's assistant, who doubles as a public relations director, W.C. Hamilton, boasted that Birmingham has no suit with the Department of Justice on Title VII or Title II of the 1964 Civil Rights Act. He says before the act was signed, the city had distributed explanatory pamphlets to 6000 businessmen.

Hamilton complained that Negroes are not meeting up to their responsibilities because, when job training schools were suddenly opened to Negroes, they didn't come flocking to the doors. "Negro leaders have a responsibility to get the children to train for the newly open jobs and go after them."

Hamilton boasted of a 10 day seminar held in Birmingham for labor unions, employers, and Negro leaders. The rate of Negro improvement in income and education is faster than the whites'. "The root of the problem," Hamilton feels, "is the economic competition of unskilled white and Negro laborers." Later he says, "Income has very little to do with acceptibility," and, "You'd have trouble in hgiher priced apartments if Negroes moved in." That sounds inconsistent to me, I don't know about you.

Hamilton says the Negro community doesn't want integrated housing, only a place to live. Later, he mentioned neighborhoods in the city that were integrated. He mentioned that, under the freedom of choice plan, schoolchildren didn't apply to other schools, that they had merely wanted the right. Was there intimidation, I asked? Oh, no we didn't have any intimidation here.

Finally, I was to be taught that A.G. Gaston, Negro millionaire, based his business on segregation because he never sold insurance to whites.

Oh, yes, and just to cap things off, we have an explanation from Mr. Hamilton on why the public housing is still completely segregated. The problem, of course, comes from no demands by Negroes to move into white public housing or white neighborhoods. How about that!

Organization of the Negro community

What Negro community? What organization? That is not to say that neither exists, but I had trouble putting my finger on anything.

Vincent Mazzara, a white man who builds predominantly for Negroes, felt that A.G. Gaston, the millionaire, and John Drew, in real estate, would emerge as the rightful leaders of the Negro community in Birmingham. These two organized the Park West urban renewal project, which I'll mention later.

Dr. John Nixon, head of NAACP in Birmingham and Alabama, says he's preparing to launch demonstrations against segregated public housing and against discrimination in urban renewal relocation practices. Wilbur Hollins, newly employed in relocation, devotes his free time, in the face of failing health, to voter registration. Birmingham is 35-40% Negro, but Negroes comprise only 20-25% of the voters. He says everytime he gets some Negroes registered, the whites try to register more. The Jefferson County Democratic Party is integrated. With the last elections of precinct committeemen, Hollins says, young people are in control.

Availability of mortgage financing evidently hasn't been a problem in the past ten years. Negroes were able to interest the Masons, with their assets of 8 to 10 million dollars, to make some investment in mortgage lending. Then, once the Negro insurance company got into the act, the white lenders took note of the market and made their mortgage money available to Negroes.

Wilbur Hollins became the first Negro on a Birmingham commission two years ago, when he was appointed to the planning commission. The only other Negro on a commission is Arthur Shores, who is on the public housing and urban renewal (one) commission. The mayor's advisory committee on relocation includes three Negroes.

Public housing and urban renewal

Of 5527 public housing units in Birmingham, 2270 are white, the remaining Negro. There are no integrated units; there have been no applicants of whites for Negro projects or Negro applicants for white projects. If there were? "We won't break any Federal law," says deputy director George Davis, once a tenant of public housing himself many, many years ago.

The smallest project in Birmingham is 200 units, the largest 910. One application office is entirely Negro-staffed. The other office is white except for the printer and a Neighborhood Youth Corps enrollee.

Community services for public housing tenants appear all-inclusive: kinderkarten for all the children (none is offered in city schools); day care; recreation; classes in sewing, ceramics, Bible, adult literacy, nutrition and kitchen care (in model kitchens), planned parenthood, and health and safety. There is a mobile library that makes the rounds of the 9 projects. Also, public health nurses and a visiting teacher. The community buildings for each project are leased to and run by the Park Board, YWCA, Methodist Board of Missions, Birmingham Baptist Association, and Community Chest.

The medical center and civic center urban renewal projects are presently involved with relocation. "Attitudes of separate housing prevail," says Wilbur Hollins, relocation director. Whites are still relocated into white neighborhoods; Negroes, into Negro neighborhoods. Standard relocation housing is supposed to be offered. But minimal standards are used and these may be liberally interpreted, which means people are perhaps being moved to other slums, which would be nothing new in Birmingham.

A.G. Gaston and John Drew formed the Park West committee, took their total clearance proposal to the mayor, and got their project moved from number 50+ to number 3. The goal of the project, I think is to build new moderate cost housing on low cost land.

"Operation Pride" is a code enforcement project, Federally-aided. It's supposed to be the first of its kind, providing low cost loans and grants for building repairs. But there is a problem with state legislation preventing the city from turning over Federal relocation money (to move people from condemned buildings) to the city health department to dispense the money. The project is just starting. No loans have been made yet.

Code enforcement elsewhere in the city focuses on about 14 areas, 10 of them the city's worst areas (rental) and 4 areas that are about to decline. Real estate agents have been cooperative, says Dale Richards, Chief Housing Inspector. Where there is no agent, the city can condemn and vacate the property. The biggest problem is that retired and other people on fixed incomes can't afford the repairs. In such cases, Richards says, he extends their time limits for meeting the city codes.

A Federal requirement now puts relocation site offices in urban renewal areas a year before property acquisition begins. The local community action agency (War on Poverty), which is 50-50 white and Negro in Jefferson County, is supposed to coordinate its programs with the relocation site offices, also a Federal requirement. They have been in contact, by mail.

Much in the news and on the lips of Birmingham citizens have been the recent elections in 16 neighborhoods of advisory councils, which, in turn, choose representatives to the Jefferson County community action agency, called the Committee for Economic Opportunity. The 16 neighborhoods are target azeas of disadvantaged people. Their representatives will make up the required 1/3 representation of the poor on the anti-poverty board. Jim Wright, Birmingham's Planning Director, called the neighborhood elections "the blind leading blind." He was equally unperceptive of local matters relating to the poor and to Negroes. Aaugh!

Biracial participation in anti-poverty meetings was the first interracial contact for citizens from such communities as Adamsville, Leeds, Warrior, Trussville, and Bessemer. So says the anti-poverty director, a Mr. Carr, graduate of N.Y.U. School of Social Work and formerly the Duane Beck of Birmingham.

Last year the school board wouldn't let Head Start children go to integrated or to white schools. So, Negro schools and churches were used. But the faculty and teacher's aides, for the first time were more than 1/3 white. The archbishop has given permission for the use of Catholic schools for the coming year.

There are 500 out-of-school Neighborhood Youth Corps enrollees, 75% of them Negro, working in biracial teams for city departments.

At the day care center in a Negro area, high income white children are brought from across town, since low income white parents won't send their children there.

Carr says his is probably the most integrated office in the city. (It is.)

Most of the city's vacant land is owned by industry. The housing authority has difficulty finding sites to build on. Land in more outlying areas is more difficult to build on, topographically, not to mention its inaccessibility. And the city doesn't seem interested in writing down the cost of renewal sites for builders of moderate cost housing.

Presently, the housing authority wants to build 1000 new units to help meet future relocation needs. The homebuilders are opposed, saying they could build housing just as durable, cheaper, and more attractive if the city would just provide the low priced land.

Vincent Mazzara is among these homebuilders. He says he knows of sponsors who are interested in 221(d)(3) using rent supplements. He said the 16th St. Baptist Church (the one that was bombed) is interested sponsoring 300 units.

Mazzara feels that Negroes in the Birmingham area need their jobs upgraded. He says slum dwellers need training in how to keep up housing. He thinks big plants should be sold on the idea that better housing can mean better employees. The plants, after all, have the money and the land to put up housing.

He says there have been a few tests by Negroes of moving into white neighborhoods, but that, otherwise, Negroes prefer Negro neighborhoods.

Went to see Orzell Billingsley. He told me how he helped a group of people in Huntsville get $1000 and more increase on the offers for their homes in an urban renewal area. His share of the increase was 1/2 to 1/3.

Conclusions

There is a cycle of attitudes in Birmingham that feeds back on itself to the assured detriment of ever providing good housing eqally available to all. This despite the mayor and council's stated goal of "a decent, safe and sanitary home for every citizen." The cycle begins with a lack of commitment, a tokenism in the attitudes of city officials: Housing authority administrators still point to all Negro projects when suggesting possible choices for Negro applicants. W.C. Hamilton has produced a booklet on the government of the city of Birmingham that is to be distributed to school libraries and made available for purchase. And possibly the school board will offer a course, using the booklet. But the booklet is mechanical, slanted, verbose, and dull. A token effort in the face of a critical need.

Code enforcement is understaffed and underfunded. Code enforcement officials take no interest related programs or the related needs of families living in substandard housing. Relocation is an afterthought program, not geared to first providing the housing, but rather, geared to first getting the urban renewal land. Low cost housing programs outside of public housing haven't even been investigated by the city.

The result of this lack of commitment is most assuredly a lack of information on housing issues. And with this lack of information, the taxpayer feels he doesn't want to subsidize somebody else with a housing program. And with this lack of understanding, we get right back to a lack of commitment all over again.

The role of the Federal government can be seen very clearly in Birmingham. Were it not for the Workable Program requirement, the city's code enforcement program that began in 1958 would probably not exist. The absence of Federal policy can also be seen. It explains why the public housing is still segregated.

Finally, better housing, neighborhoods, and communities require so much education that the average citizen, much less the average school student, never gets. Who understands zoning? Who's ever heard of many of the Federal programs, much less knows how they work?

You don't pick up these things on your own any more than you pick up good driver training, except by sheer luck. Most of us live in cities these days and pay taxes to support the city services we depend on. Yet, we so little understand how our city operates. Is it any wonder we have slums, traffic problems, and smog, when most of our ideas and information about city living come from tv commercials and magazine ads!

An Essay On 'Speaking Out'

Demands that the President "speak out" against slum riots are part of the explanation of why these dreadful, grievous riots occur. They are not race riots. They are triggered by the most routine and trivial incidents — a policeman, for example, cuts off a fire hydrant where kids frolic in and out of the spray on a desperate, hot day when the pavement is soft from heat and there is no escape from it. Shoving and pushing begins. A riot develops in which men and kids are hurt. (Politicians who ask that the President speak out are, of course, seeking to divert attention from their own failures and to make the President the whipping boy. They really know better.)

Editors, ministers, laymen, and politicians angrily demand that those in authority "speak out," that the police and judges "get tougher." This is a sad and immature suggestion. It is an old, even illogical response to an old and ugly situation that demands a creative answer.

Tough Crackdowns

Ministers have been speaking out against sin for generations. There have been tough crackdowns on crime and sin. Heaven alone knows how many persons have "spoken out" against various forms of immorality and corruption. Prisons and jails are as crowded as our mental institutions. For years we have needed a new response to these problems. It has not been made.

No matter who "speaks out," or how "tough" the judges and police man become, the slums remain. The people are there. They are what they were. They are what they are. Their condition is what it was. Their condition is what it is.

They are human beings. Neither they nor their condition will be changed by "speaking out" or filling the jails.

There has been a lot of speaking out — and very little of doing. There is no surprise in the coming of the riots. There is a sadness in their violence. The damage done is confined largely to the Negro residents—their persons and their belongings. There is a certain madness in the riots. And they, of course, solve nothing. They are as much an immaturity as is the policy that asks that there be a "speaking out" instead of action against the fact of slums and their conditions. One cannot in any sense condone the disorders and violence. But one can comprehend that until there is positive, remedial action the powder will lie there, ready to be ignited.

Conditions

That some of the riots are used by organizations of dubious intent and purpose is likely true. But, still, they could not if reused conditions were not what they are.

Other cities, South and North, are vulnerable. As of this writing, for example, one could expect Jacksonville to have trouble. There are, in that city, desperate conditions, long neglected. There has been much "speaking out" and "tough" law enforcement by segregationist political power.

Atlanta has one slum situation where, despite a beginning of alleviation of conditions, rival factions seem to be trying to create demonstrations. Yet, it is a piece of folly to ignore the fact that in all slum riots where organizations are accused, they could not act if conditions were not what they are.

Neither "speaking out," "getting tough with police," "the courts," nor calling out the guard can produce more than a temporary stillness. The people, their awful living conditions, will remain.

Those whose only answer is "speaking out" and getting tough encourage violence and give strength to the very organizations they deplore.

It should be plain that the cost of really doing what must be done about slums is less than years of riots, but apparently it is not. Too many wish merely to "speak out."

WASHINGTON - Notes for the file

1. In one of your publications that was sent me you said your two key problems were real estate agents and the public schools. How have these problems been handled over the years, especially the schools?

   Washington has found, as has everyone, that the real estate agents are perhaps the most difficult to deal with, and the findings are not any different from what we have heard before. They were able to have a great deal of effect by assembling evidence against one particular agent and making a charge about him to the governing board of the real estate agents who put him on probation with a warning. After that Neighbors, Inc. didn't have as many blatant promotions of blockbusting. It was rather interesting to note that Mrs. Ware felt that the school problem was the most difficult for for this is a continuing matter, always needing attention , to upgrade schools. The main problem in schools comes at the junior high level because of prejudices concerning socializing of the sexes which starts at this age. They help in these particular problems by having the principal of the junior high send one or more people to each of the elementary schools to prepare the students for the transition to the junior high school and attendant problems. Washington Neighbors, Inc. also has a monthly meeting of their education committee at which the principal of a school attends, and they work out a constructive program approach including support of the budget for the schools and the D. C. government. In all of the problems, Washington Neighbors, Inc. use the newsletter to set forth everything favorable that is happening in the neighborhood. Neighbors have also had a "rumor clinic" in their newsletter in which they investigated all rumors and gave facts. Neighbors found that the average person does not take the trouble to ascertain the difference between fact and fiction.

2. What are the continuing programs at NI; what have they to offer;' how are they staffed?

   In the literature all of the continuing programs are included in the listing of committees. The staffing problem seems to be mainly a matter of finance and conviction by the governing board as to the particular needs at the time. At present they have less staff than they did the two previous years.

3. How many are on your professional staff? What are their functions and the services they offer?

   They have had two professional members of the staff in the past and only have one at the present time who is Mrs. Ware. She is a sociologist by training. I believe she feels she needs a professional community organizer now as well as a professional office manager or business manager.

4. Where does the money come from for your budget, especially foundation grants? What sort of proposals are sent in and to whom?

   The Meyers Foundation originally gave NI $28,000 for three years and matched $3,000 in addition later. At the present time NI have produced approximately $4,500 from the Art and Book Festival, membership and some larger donations. Getting the money becomes increasingly difficult year by year.

5. Have you ever had an Eleanor Roosevelt NAIRO intern?

   Yes, and they found him very successful.

6. How is the budget at this time? I noticed in your 1963 Annual Report that you had a deficit.

   When the 1965 Annual Report is completed, they will mail us a copy.

7. Have you maintained community interest and concern over the years? How? If not, where do you diagnose the trouble to lie?

   NI have maintained community interest by keeping the needs up to date, keeping aware of what the people need, what concerned parents and other people in the neighborhood are interested in at the particular time. NI also keeps junior high students occupied with hayrides and parties and visits to other parts of the community; they also have choral groups and these activities have the participation and support of interested parents. In the future the stress will be more on community development because Mrs. Ware feels they have gone to this particular stage in their development. NI has an effective help by the Conference of Clergy, both Negro and white, and excellent help by an extremely able superintendent of the junior high. Their help in other areas of the city and in neighboring Maryland and Virginia has developed a pride of accomplishment in this particular neighborhood. They have used the method of visiting people who have prestige and improving the prestige of the neighborhood and associating themselves with the prestige needs of the metropolitan area of Washington, D. C.

Dear Mr. Smith:

Thank you for your kind letter of welcome of July 19, 1966. While the announcement of my appointment was made over a month ago, I assumed my new duties only this past week. Your letter made my arrival a bit more comfortable.

It will be a little while before plans for the Urban Studies Center take clear form. Meanwhile, I would appreciate any additional material that may emerge from your Urban Planning Project. I suspect the "New South" would also help us obtain a better perspective.

I will let you know of any trips to Atlanta, and hope that you will do the same about trips to Louisville, or to any national professional meetings we might both attend.

Sincerely yours,

Housing Opportunities in Southern Cities*

Take a handful of Southern cities, an industrial giant, a rural county seat, a tourist town, a trade center; take one with a scarcity of land, one with plenty; take one city with lots of revenue, one with little; take one city with good race relations, one with bad. Take a handful of Southern cities and look at the housing. What do you see?

You see ugly, segregated public housing. There's never enough of it for all the people who can't afford decent shelter, whether you're in a ~~the~~ city that is wealthy or poor. The bland but safe structures you see are ~~It's~~ a seeming gesture for the Negroes who can't find jobs because of discrimination, whether industry abounds in that city or is lacking. Public housing is a gesture for the elderly ~~famil~~ on fixed incomes, whether or not you're in a city with ~~there is~~ ample land ~~in the city or not~~, for private builders aren't interested in building low-cost housing. It's a gesture for the families who don't mind having their apartments inspected or taking a day from work to have their incomes recertified, whether you're in a ~~or not~~ ~~the~~ city that can afford to hire employees to handle administration more humanely. Public housing is ~~It's~~ a gesture for the mothers and children who don't mind being isolated from the rest of the community and the fathers who have to move their families out when their income gets too high. There is a certain sameness of housing opportunities in this handful of such diverse Southern cities.

You see urban renewal projects that relocate families into segregated neighborhoods that, if not slums already, are about to become slums. Sometimes the houses families move to are worse than the ones they left. The urban renewal you see isn't a low-cost housing program; it's a business expansion program or a ~~site for a~~ civic center site or a land cost write-down for middle and upper income housing. If a

*This article may be just as appropriate for Northern cities, the main difference being that the history of racial discrimination is more obvious in the South than in the North.

project gets proposed that will rehabilitate a neighborhood for the families living there, the project gets defeated in a bond issue referendum, whether you're in a prosperous city ~~or one~~ with limited revenue or one that is prosperous

In this handful of Southern cities, you see general planning that finances new airports and industrial parks but that ~~kind~~ can't find funds in its budget to put sewers in the Negro neighborhoods or pick up the garbage ~~there~~ ~~and junk~~ ~~cars~~ there. You see code enforcement that hits impoverished homeowners who can't get financing for improvements and that ignores the tenants subject to the whims of slum landlords. You see zoning that protects the wealthier subdivisions but ignores the poorer neighborhoods.

There's one thing you don't see in this handful of Southern cities: enough standard low-cost ~~private~~ either public or private housing, Cities don't write down the cost of urban renewal land for private builders of low and moderate cost housing. Cities don't teach people who've never bought a home how to save their equity or how to guard aganist slick-operating contractors. Cities don't encourage private builders or nonprofit sponsors to take advantage of the Federal aid programs that already exist for providing low and moderate cost housing.

Federal officials don't review and evaluate housing and renewal plans for their impact on minority groups. They don't urge integration in public housing or in relocation. Sometimes they speak a language that city folks can't understand. Federal officials deal with the Federal programs to suit Federal agencies, whether or not ~~they~~ the programs fit the needs of the cities. Congressional hearings dwell endlessly on the need to find talented people in a county that abounds in human resources.

State officials add to the red tape, instead of helping cities get through it. Some ~~of them~~ states, for example, have laws to stop certain Federal aid programs altogether. But the states don't have laws to control unscrupulous landlords or to tax them on ~~the basis of~~ their high-profit rental income ~~from rentals instead of the~~ rather than their low-value, ~~but high profit~~ ~~deteriorated~~ dilapidated property.

Cities resist sharing in by organizing land, loans, builders, equity, home maintenance, education and property tax, trans, needs of low-income families.

City officials don't have a genuine commitment to the housing needs of their citizens. Citizens themselves are not fully aware of the problems nor are they informed about housing programs. Housing opportunities look bleak in this handful of Southern cities.

What can you do about housing? ~~should be done~~ At the Federal level, urge Congress ~~should~~ to authorize wholeheartedly its long neglected role of research in low cost private housing. Insist that the research should be published and widely distributed to home-builders and nonprofit sponsors. Require that no public housing projects ~~should~~ be approved that will contribute to segregated living, by unit or by neighborhood. Seek more funds ~~should be available~~ for good architectural standards and have public housing building requirements ~~should be~~ streamlined and brought up to date to reduce unit costs. Urge ~~to~~ Rent supplements ~~should be available to~~ for families and individuals who can't afford the minimum rent in public housing.

Urge Congress to approve only those urban renewal clearance projects ~~should~~ that begin with a low-and-moderate-cost housing building program. See that New housing units for relocated families ~~should be~~ are convenient to jobs and transportation for ~~these~~ families.

Require Plans for urban renewal, public housing, and general planning ~~should~~ to be reviewed by Federal agencies for their impact on minority groups. And see that any city receiving Federal funds for housing, planning, or renewal funds ~~should~~ has a full-time staff to keep abreast of Federal programs and make the Federal programs known to local citizens.

Insist that information put out by Federal agencies and officials, both written and spoken, is in language that you, the ~~average~~ can citizen, can understand and use easily. Require ~~the~~ Federal agencies to prepare educational materials on Federal programs that you use in your community for adults and school children as well.

Where programs don't fit the needs of your community, urge your Congressmen to make these programs flexible.

At the state level, urge your state government to engage in statewide planning to build a framework in which each community will grow. ~~Should your~~ State agencies are in a strategic position to guide the growth of communities ~~through~~ by controlling ~~such decisions~~ ~~the~~ investments ~~development~~ ~~obtaine~~ in highways, parks, industry, and educational institutions. ~~Second best, insist on ample professional assistance~~ See that your state laws do not prevent or discourage housing programs. Urge the passage of laws that will tax landlords on their rental income, and give tenants the ~~po~~ right to demand safe, decent housing from their landlords.

Urge your state government to provide housing programs to supplement Federal housing aids, and to acquire land for building low cost housing outside urban renewal areas.

~~It~~ Urge your state government to provide people to help your community with its housing problems and to train people from your community to become public housing administrators, building inspectors, urban renewal directors, community service specialists, and low-cost housing experts.

Above all, see that your state government develops community education materials and programs for all school grade levels.

At the city level, see that your local government uses the tools it has available to provide good housing, including Federal aids, local tax assessments, and community education in the public schools and for adults. And ~~urge~~ call on members of ~~the citizen groups to which you belong~~ your own citizen and community groups to urge action for good housing at all ~~levels of~~ government levels.

~~If the~~ If so much needs to be done by government and ~~of~~ lay citizens and if housing opportunities look so bleak anyway, why bother? Will it make a difference if you try to do anything about housing?

We looked at our handful of Southern cities a bit hastily. Let's look more closely and see if there aren't some good things being done about housing.

Why, one of our cities has a whole range of community services for its public housing tenants. Look at them: kindergarten for all the children; day care; recreation; classes in sewing, ceramics, adult literacy, nutrition, and kitchen care, planned parenthood, and health and safety; and the ~~mobile~~ services of a mobile library, a public health nurse, and a visiting teacher. ~~In another city~~ These services didn't just happen; they were programmed by a housing administrator who wanted to do something for better housing.

In another city, the tenants of one public housing project have formed an organization to get better community services. The tenants didn't just up and ~~do it~~ organize. An economic opportunity worker got the tenants interested and worked from his center to help them.

In still another city, a public housing project is integrated. That didn't just happen, either. The director made a point of telling every applicant about every project and ~~where~~ exactly where every vacancy existed.

Four men from an urban renewal neighborhood got together and called on the urban renewal director to hold a meeting to explain to them their rights. The four men called on everyone in the neighborhood to attend the meeting. The meeting was a success. Other meetings followed. Race relations improved. The urban renewal project improved. It started with four men.

Three men asked the mayor for an urban renewal project, pledging their cooperation. They got the project. Housing will be built for moderate income families.

Ask all questions without undue emphasis on their importance except where words are underscored for clarity. If respondent does not understand a question, repeat it carefully to him.

Be as objective as possible in your own responses. It's fine to be friendly, but in general do not indicate your own sympathies, approval or disapproval to answers stated by respondent. Do not pry and probe. However, on open end questions it is all right to respond in a way to encourage further response if respondent seems willing and has something to say of interest to the overall purposes of the survey.

Urban Problems — Business

Corporate brains hit city ills

New urban affairs experts are companies' answer to problems plaguing cities

There's a new specialist moving into the upper ranks of the U. S. corporations: the man in charge of urban affairs.

In the past year, companies in fields as diverse as retailing, chemicals, and banking have begun trying to develop their own talent to deal with the whole long gamut of urban problems.

Much of the new man's work is in coordinating programs in which their companies are already active. But they are expected to go beyond such staples as minority group employment to explore such areas as housing, urban renewal, health and education, and master planning for their localities, and to recommend relevant policies.

One reason the urban affairs appointments have been coming thick and fast is the impetus from national developments. The formation of the National Alliance of Businessmen earlier this year played its part. Another major spur has been the increasing federal government emphasis on training and hiring inner-city minorities: It has placed a heavy load on personnel offices and prompted many companies to establish urban departments.

A number of companies have seen the opportunity of applying their built-in expertise to urban problems. Radio Corp. of America, for instance, three months ago created a systems development organization aimed at using the company's systems engineering talents on social problems. Thomas G. Paterson, a specialist in large-scale information systems, heads the group.

Inside and out. More often than not, companies are finding their urban affairs talent inside the corporation walls, and are also discovering that a professional background in

"Since California is the major market for new car purchases, it made sense for Ford to build it's production facilities in Santa Clara County. Geographically located in the heart of this vital marketing area, our plant in Milpitas, starting in 1955, has grown from 2,761 employees to over 4,000 with an average annual production of 200,000 cars and trucks. As an outdoorsman I, along with other Ford employees, enjoy the varied recreational opportunities California offers. Also, we'd like to add a big plus to the fine housing available and the excellent county-wide educational system."

urban matters is not a prerequisite. L. J. Haynes, for example, who was named director of urban affairs at Michigan Bell Telephone Co. five months ago, was formerly general marketing manager. Union Carbide Corp.'s new director of urban affairs, John A. LeVan, was a company lawyer. And Bank of America's Marvin E. Cardoza, new vice-president of personnel relations, moved over from a post in governmental finance.

Yet some companies do seek outside specialists for their urban affairs staffs. Federated Department Stores, Inc., a year ago hired Dennis Durden, a land development consultant, as operating vice-president in charge of urban affairs. His consulting duties are precisely defined: service to Federated's 17 operating divisions—in downtown urban renewal, model cities, regional planning, and minority employment; service to trade associations in which the company has membership; and service to senior management—speeches, legislation, background studies, position papers. "I provide the same kind of service that a real estate expert does," says Durden.

Indirectly, Durden also provides services to cities in which Federated has an operating unit. A typical case: A city comes up with a broad urban renewal plan, but is unsure of its feasibility. Federated's local management is contacted and Durden is brought in from Cincinnati headquarters. "I conduct an analysis of my own," he says, "talk with local planners and our management, then recommend to our people how the project can best be carried out." The project is not necessarily one in which Federated will take part.

Different styles. Federated's approach, however, is just one of a wide variety. Red-bearded R. Wayne Nelson joined Westinghouse Electric Corp.'s construction group a year ago as urban planning director, and like Durden, he had planning experience. Yet his duties are quite different. He spends most of his time consulting with Westinghouse's land developer customers. Though Nelson's advice is largely confined to urban planning, it does happen that the customer may be interested in, say, a Westinghouse lighting system. Though Nelson emphasizes that he isn't a salesman, he will try to answer the customer's questions. "Service is never binding to the customer," says Nelson, "but it is persuasive in terms of continuity." And Nelson thinks the corporate urban planner with government experience has greater respect for "real problems" than have government officials.

Seeking a good source of supervisors?

Probably the handiest, largest group of possibilities you can find is the women you are employing now.

You may have noticed in some of them the willingness to give that little bit more to their jobs and to accept responsibility when it is offered to them.

With a little help from you many of these women may become reliable supervisors, foremen, office managers or administrative assistants. All it takes is more confidence on their part in their personal ability to retain their poise and keep the good will of others.

They can develop this confidence and security about their personal abilities through the Dorothy Carnegie program. It offers you a way to bring up from within your company supervisory personnel that is already trained and experienced in the ways of your organization.

therapy for urban maladies. Because of its sheer size and decentralization, General Electric Co. feels that three men are needed. One handles internal urban affairs (minority employment, personnel management, and matters pertaining to the National Alliance of Businessmen), and another deals with external ones (community organizations, Urban Coalition). The third man is W. Blake Miller, who less than a year ago was manager of GE's industrial heating department in Shelbyville, Ind. Last October, GE transferred him to New York headquarters as manager of marketing consulting and urban affairs, a new component. His job is "sifting out the problems of the city and seeing what can be done to translate them into action"—with an eye to developing profit areas in urban business. "After all," says Miller, "we're not sociologists and politicians here."

Social solution. So far, GE hasn't come up with much, Miller admits. RCA, on the other hand, is going full speed ahead with at least one project. Paterson, its information systems expert, is designing a mobile, multi-test, health clinic that will make possible mass screening. It will be specially equipped to spot diseases prevalent in slum areas—cervical cancer, for one. After being set up in the ghetto, it would be manned by local residents and monitored by doctors at closed-circuit television screening stations, from which they can direct the testing and treatment of patients.

Paterson's position, the first corporate urban affairs post above the divisional level, was created shortly after RCA's annual meeting in May of last year. It was then that President Robert W. Sarnoff pledged to "do whatever we can to help remedy the conditions that are tearing at the social fabric of our nation."

Paterson's approach to urban problem-solving is based on the long view. "The problems of the 1970s need not be the problems of the 1980s," he says, "if we do our work now."

The total approach. One urban-affairs officer doing his work now is W. E. Thompson, who was city manager of Oakland, Calif. for 11 years, and is now Dayton Corp.'s vice-president for environmental sciences. Thompson, who joined the Minneapolis-based department store two years ago, sees his job as a behind-the-scenes prime mover in solving problems ranging from race relations to sewage control. He admits to enlightened self-interest. If downtown and its neighboring residential areas collapse, he reasons, so would much of Dayton's retail business.

Thompson, who reports directly to the Dayton family, considers not only the city's economic aspects but also its social and cultural ones as being within his province. Not surprisingly, he has stepped on some toes, including those of a local politician, who insists Minneapolis can solve its own problems.

But Thompson has ideas of his own—including an international conference center for science. Thompson sees a very good reason why Minneapolis, already a cultural leader with its Tyrone Guthrie Theater and the prestigious University of Minnesota, should also be a scientific magnet—"so all the datelines in the paper read 'Minneapolis' and people will be impressed that this is where the intellectual action is."

Help at the top. But most companies are confining their urban affairs undertakings to more traditional areas—particularly minority group employment and training and work with self-help groups. Kaiser Aluminum & Chemical Corp., for one, has moved former FBI agent Thomas N. Bowdle to director of equal opportunities affairs. He reports directly to president T. J. Ready, Jr., who refers to the year-old position as a "catalyst." Aided by a staff of three—two Negroes, one white—Bowdle coordinates all Kaiser activities that involve minorities.

Bank of America's Cardoza is another urban affairs director who reports directly to the top—that is, to President Rudolph A. Peterson and the managing committee. And because he is a member of the bank's "president's office," his programs cannot be diluted by intermediates.

Special assistance. As a one-man staff, Cardoza must draw heavily on various departments for the specialized talents that can get his programs off the ground. His own special status helps—as in the case of two training officers conducting classes for nonwhites; they bypass their direct superior and report directly to him. William R. Layfield, human relations coordinator, is another major supporting arm. He acts as Cardoza's liaison with minority group organizations.

The new urban affairs men, though their approaches frequently differ, point to a common interest on the part of senior management. Kaiser's Ready reflects that rising interest when he says: "Equal employment opportunity is a responsibility to be discharged with the same aggressiveness and creativity we invoke in the normal conduct of all our other management functions." End

Urban Problems - Unions 9-13-69

IBEW Analysis Shows:

Land Costs and Interest Rates Chief Factors in Housing Costs

The following material appears in the September 1969 issue of The Electrical Workers World, monthly publication of the IBEW. The article, entitled "Balderdash," appears in the magazine's Dept. of Research & Education section.

CRITICS of construction unions, with their ease of access to mass communication media, have been extremely successful in conditioning the general public to believe that construction unions, through restrictive work practices, monopoly control of the work force, and high wages, are the primary cause of soaring housing costs.

Time and time again, these accusations have been refuted by knowledgeable and responsible persons from all areas of the society, but because of limited exposure, the truth has had little impact on the general public.

A recent study, prepared by McGraw-Hill for the President's Committee on Urban Housing, is the basis for an enlightening analysis of the relationships between the various components of monthly occupancy costs of a development-built, single-family house. The following presentation differs from the original McGraw-Hill presentation in that it is a more detailed analysis of the debt retirement and the assumed rate of interest is 8 percent instead of 6 percent, which was in effect at the time the study was originally prepared.

The unit analyzed in the McGraw-Hill study was chosen according to specifications of the President's Committee on Urban Housing. The costs shown in this study are the actual costs for a single location. Thus, such cost factors as land and taxes, in particular, may be significantly different in other locations.

The analysis was based on the construction of a one-story, wood-frame, ranch-style house built on a slab with a partial basement. Three bedrooms, a living room and dining room, plus a kitchen and bath account for 1,000 square feet of living area. This house is built on one-third of an acre and has city water, gas heat, and a septic system.

The McGraw-Hill analysts first studied the initial cost of construction and development and then prepared a second study, which included it with other costs essential to the occupancy of a house.

Initial construction costs are related to monthly occupancy costs in other ways, besides being a portion of debt retirement. For example, high-quality thermal insulation will increase initial costs but result in reduced heating and air-conditioning costs in the long run. Time and time again, this type of decision occurs in the design of a house. In each case, there is a trade-off of higher initial costs versus lower occupancy costs. The analysts, aware of this relationship, emphasized the broader and much more important monthly occupancy cost, which includes such absolutely essential factors as debt retirement, taxes, utilities, maintenance, and repairs.

Unfortunately, the McGraw-Hill study obscured the actual cost attributable to on-site labor by including it with the other four elements of development and construction costs, plus the cost of financing in a broad, general category of debt retirement. The principal objection to this method is that the addition of the financing costs imputes to labor a responsibility for the terms of financing, which is completely beyond its control.

The actual fact is that a 20 percent increase in labor costs is responsible, at the most, for about 4 percent in the increase of construction and development costs and less than 1 percent in the increase of monthly occupancy costs.

Conversely, a 20 percent reduction in wages or a 20 percent increase in productivity will decrease the cost of housing by only those same relatively-small amounts. Therefore, the critics are concentrating their efforts on an area which, at best, will produce only minimum efficiencies.

In fact if labor costs were entirely free, the monthly occupancy costs would still be $186.40, or only $7.60 less than the original $194.00.

The outstanding fact of this analysis is that the borrower will repay $40,320 on a $15,276 mortgage at 8 percent interest for 30 years. This is almost three times the cost of the house. The interest alone comes out to $25,044, or over one and one-half times the original cost of the house.

NEXT TO INTEREST RATES, local realty taxes are the largest single cost item. This area involves the complex political relationships and responsibilities of the local, state and federal government. Any effort to disturb the present balance, or more accurately imbalance, triggers a wide variety of hostile responses. The fact remains that realty taxes place an inequitable burden for the operation of local government on the home owner. The surest way to extend the opportunity of home ownership to a greater number of families is to decrease realty taxes.

Land represents the fastest-rising element of all major housing costs. In 1950, the average price for the site of a new, FHA-insured, one-family home was $1,035, or 12 percent of the total house price. By 1967, the average site value had increased to $3,766 and represented 20 percent of the total house price.

Ever-increasing upward pressure on land prices in the future is predictable, because land is a diminishing commodity; each year, the availability of the supply of usable land decreases. However, creative and imaginative public policy can conserve and effectively utilize this diminishing supply. These facts are not reflected in the McGraw-Hill analysis since, in order to comply with the specifications of the President's Committee on Urban Housing, the land costs were limited to $3,000 an acre.

This is a non-realistic restriction, because the only land available at this cost is located a considerable distance from the urban centers. Consequently, the land cost component in this study is not representative of the real market.

In summary, the unreasonable persistence of the intensive attack on construction labor costs defies explanation, when compared to the impact of the other cost components on monthly occupancy costs, unless ulterior motives are involved.

Accordingly, if ignorance is excluded, it can be safely assumed that these attacks are a direct attempt to influence public opinion and, thus, create conditions which weaken all of organized labor's bargaining position by limiting the effectiveness of construction unions.

Urban Problems

William Gorham, a youthful alumus of HEW, heads the new Urban Institute, a super think-tank concerned with city problems.

CITIES

Urban programs face a sharper scrutiny

Federally-sponsored institute will keep close tabs on programs conducted by both business and government. The goal: better answers

Executives of companies actively involved in programs aimed at urban problems will soon have a hand-picked group of experts looking over their shoulders. At the same time, the same eyes will be scrutinizing big city mayors, school boards, police chiefs, and Washington bureaucrats who spend billions of dollars on expanding health, housing, education, and welfare programs.

Applying the microscope to these often divergent groups will be the federally-financed Urban Institute, a new super think-tank in Washington, established with a $6-million funding that it will use to dig into the explosive problems of the cities. By posing what it picks as the "right questions" on such issues as poor schooling, poor housing, vast unemployment, the rising crime rate, and bureaucratic failures, the new group hopes to come up with better answers than those produced by other urban experts.

Last week, William Gorham, 37, the Urban Institute's president and a former Assistant Secretary of Health, Education & Welfare, spelled out his plans to a blue-chip board. Among the board members: Arjav Miller, vice-chairman of Ford Motor Co.; Edgar F. Kaiser of Kaiser Industries; Stanley Marcus of Neiman-Marcus; J. I. Miller, chairman of Cummins Engine Co.; Whitney M. Young, executive director of the National Urban League; and Cyrus R. Vance, President Johnson's top trouble-shooter.

Casting wide net. Although dozens of private and public agencies and foundations dig into such urban ills as unemployment and poor education, the institute also intends to explore areas that have received less attention. For instance, it will look into federal, state, and local governments, as well as civilian institutions, to determine how decision-making really works on urban issues, and whether participation in solutions can be increased without losing efficiency.

Institute President Gorham is one of the systems whiz kids of former Defense Secretary Robert S. McNamara. Gorham moved on to other federal agencies and now he is more concerned with building his staff—now at 27, but to be bolstered to 80 or 90 within one year—than listing specific projects. However, one major effort already being planned is an attempt to determine precisely why Negro unemployment and underemployment run as high as 40% in some cities—at a time when the nation is near full employment and spending for job training and unemployment compensation is $4.5-billion.

Real meanings. The usual answers—discrimination, lack of skills, poor transportation facilities—will not be good enough, Gorham stresses. "It isn't enough to have a list of these things," he says. "The question is which are really the major barriers to Negro employment." Quarterbacking this program will be Harvey A. Garn, 37, an econometrician hired away from the Commerce Dept.'s Economic Development Administration.

Another project that will be a quick starter is a study of overlapping and duplication in scores of federal programs dealing with cities. Gorham expects to have a comprehensive report "very useful to the next Administration" ready by next June or July. Eventually, the institute will expand into program design—helping federal agency heads shape different and better programs, and perhaps killing off old ones.

First targets. The major thrust of the institute, at least in the early stages, will be aimed at present urban programs and problems. To Gorham, "a program is a hypothesis." His reasoning is that when a particular program is created, the hypothesis is that the problem will be eliminated. Unfortunately, he adds, most program makers and managers think of their plans not as a hypothesis which remains to be proved, but as "the answer."

Gorham cites two examples. The recently-enacted housing bill, greeted as a great advance, "is not based on a profound understanding of the housing market and how it can be changed," he says. And the politically-sensitive crime issue raises the question of why—when the U. S. spends so much money for public safety—crime indexes keep rising. A systems man at heart, Gorham proposes that the institute consider crime as a "negative output"

Industry's demand for process cooling water is tripling.

We're ready.

Within the next decade, power generating plants will be using three times as much condenser cooling water as they are today. By 1980, water demanded for the production of chemicals and allied products will more than triple. The same thing is expected to happen in pulp and paper industries. And in just about every industry across the board.

But how do you triple the availability of water when your supply of water remains constant? How? By using cooling towers to cool heated process water so that it can be used again . . . and again . . . up to thirty times.

As world industry grows, so does the need for cooling towers. The Marley Company is ready to match that growth around the world, with a complete line of water cooling towers and air cooled heat exchangers.

and see where more money might be spent along the police-court-jail system with the most return on the dollar.

In addition to reports on these and other subjects, the institute will be assigned specific research tasks by the Housing & Urban Development Dept. and other federal agencies that contributed heavily to its findings. Gorham also wants to open what the institute calls "cooperative urban centers" to provide a miniature think-tank to six to eight mayors. The city agency would be staffed by the mayor's own professionals and by outsiders.

Gorham and his aides, however, are unsure at this point how the cooperative urban centers will work. But in a move designed to test their acceptance, the Institute president this week began visiting mayors in large cities, starting with Cleveland, Los Angeles, and San Francisco.

Getting a staff. The Institute's resident staff thus far is highly-rated and fairly young. Those on the job include: Joseph Lewis, 52, an engineer-systems analyst from the Institute of Defense Analysis; Joseph S. Wholey, 33, a "mathematician-philosopher" hired from HEW, and an expert in evaluating federal programs; Dr. William Kaufmann, 50, of Massachusetts Institute of Technology, a political scientist and Pentagon consultant on military strategy questions; Don Kummerfeld, 34, a policital scientist from the Bureau of the Budget who has been evaluating urban programs there; Dr. Selma Mushkin of George Washington University, an expert on state and local financing problems; and Dan Cordtz, 41, a journalist whose major concentration lately has been urban problems.

Gorham has also brought in several black professionals, including Tony Perot, an organizer for the Congress on Racial Equality for eight years.

Despite such heavy reliance on government workers, institute sources claim that Gorham is not raiding the federal establishment for his hired help, and not paying a man more to come on board than he earned on his prior job. Gorham himself, however, receives $55,000, a considerable hike from his $28,700 salary at HEW. End

Negroes in Dixie Form Separate Municipalities In Bid to Improve Lot

They Seek Federal Urban Aid; Alabamians Get Smoother Streets, Friendlier Cops

White Attitudes Are Mixed

Staff Reporter of THE WALL STREET JOURNAL

ROOSEVELT CITY, Ala.—Willie Rankin's jobs may not seem like much—substitute policeman on a one-car police force and chief of a fire department equipped only with a garden hose—but he and the city he serves are symbols of a new era here in the South.

For Mr. Rankin is a Negro, and so is everyone else in this city, which lies in the shadow of Birmingham. Until last January, this community of 5,000 people was just an unwanted, unincorporated and unimposing neighborhood with junk in the yards and potholes in the streets. The whites who ruled the surrounding communities wanted nothing to do with the area. Among other things, they didn't want to be stuck providing services to people who could contribute little to the tax take.

But then the residents decided to incorporate, electing a mayor and a five-man city council that took over the rule-making from the county. The council elected a judge, who holds court twice a month, and appointed police and other workers. The transition was smooth, and residents now say it was the smartest thing they ever did.

The result hasn't been instant utopia, but there have been many gains and there is a new feeling of community solidarity. Waving to a pair of overalled Negroes as he patrols the streets in car 307, Willie Rankin remarks: "Before, the only time you saw a patrol car was when somebody was in trouble and the law was after him. Now, they see us, and the message is that if they need help, we're around."

The changes here in Roosevelt City will soon be copied in at least a dozen other Southern areas as black citizens seize on the tool of incorporation to better their lot. Across the South, Negro communities are discovering that incorporation brings not only such niceties as a friendly police force but also something more important: Money.

"There are millions available for cities that you can't touch without being incorporated," says Orzell Billingsley, a Negro attorney in Birmingham who was a leader in the move to incorporate Roosevelt City and who now serves as town judge. The changes here in Roosevelt City will soon be copied in at least a dozen other Southern areas as black citizens seize on the tool of incorporation to better their lot. Across the South, Negro communities are discovering that incorporation brings not only such niceties as a friendly police force but also something more important: Money.

"There are millions available for cities that you can't touch without being incorporated," says Orzell Billingsley, a Negro attorney in Birmingham who was a leader in the move to incorporate Roosevelt City and who now serves as town judge. Mayor Freddie C. Rogers, operator of a nearby nightclub called The Flame until it burned last month, shows a visitor a 701-page tome entitled Catalog of Federal Programs for Individual and Community Improvement. Put out by the Government, it lists more than 300 Federal aid projects, most tailored specially for cities, and most aimed directly at poor ones.

The mayor figures Roosevelt City qualifies on both counts. It now is a city, and the average family income is $2,500. Roosevelt City residents work mainly in Birmingham, as filling station attendants, laborers, maids and the like.

Incorporation hasn't meant much of a bonanza yet for Roosevelt City, which was so named because the residents figured their plight when they incorporated was about the same as the nation's when Franklin Roosevelt came to power. At the moment, the city is operating on a pinch-penny, $2,300-a-month budget. But that will triple in January, when the city's share of county and state revenue starts coming in.

It Takes a While

But even the January money will be peanuts compared with what Roosevelt City's leaders say is available from the Federal Government. Right now, the city is awaiting approval of a Federal study to determine just what Roosevelt City does need. Then it will enter specific requests for projects that the study presumably will show the city to need, such as a water system, fire hydrants and sewers.

Already, though, the city is finding out that requests don't bring the money by return mail. City officials have asked the Government for help with a garbage removal system, but the project is stagnating. "They haven't approved it because that program is to finance unique systems of doing away with garbage," Mayor Rogers explains. "The only thing unique about ours was that we didn't have one."

Whites' reactions to the new Negro cities are mixed. When plans to form Roosevelt City were disclosed last year, the Alabama legislature hurriedly passed a bill banning new cities within three miles of old ones. It applies only to the county where Roosevelt City is. Roosevelt City's incorporators rushed their papers through state offices before the bill became law, however.

On the other hand, there are signs of goodwill from whites. The Birmingham Ford dealer who sold Roosevelt City its police car, a 1968 Ford sedan, donated a not-too-battered 1962 dump truck, which makes up the city's sanitation and street-repair fleet. It keeps busy hauling away junk and filling potholes. (The city has been dickering for a second-hand fire engine, but all the deals have fallen through so far. Its current fire-fighting equipment—the garden hose—has been enough to put out a few brush fires.)

Mr. Hayes Plans to Move

Critics, including some civil rights activists, say the cities amount to black separatism, which they view as bad for the nation. Although one of the first laws passed in Roosevelt City was an open-housing ordinance, it's true that all the residents are black. And some Negroes concede they are moving to the all-black towns simply because they are fed up with the white world.

"I can't make it in the white man's society, so I'm getting out," says Isaiah Hayes, a 42-year-old steelworker who plans to move from Attala, Ala., to Ridgedale, a Negro town being formed nearby. "I can't be elected to anything. I can't serve on the white man's boards, and I'm sick of it. I'm going to where I can do anything I'm capable of doing."

The group forming Ridgedale, which will be made up largely of farms, hopes to set up a food-processing plant for local produce as a first step toward economic progress. Later it hopes to attract a more substantial industry. Mr. Hayes would like to see the community build, of all things, a munitions plant. "Explosives are a necessity in the violent world we live in," he says. "And if that's what the white man wants, I say we should be the ones to give it to him."

At Gees Bend, Ala., where incorporation is pending, backers hope for economic gains from a soul-food processing plant. They hope to market the food in the North to Negroes with a longing for Southern-style home-cooking. They also plan to change the name of their town to King City, in memory of Martin Luther King Jr.

Gees Bend, or King City, leaders also see incorporation as a means of capitalizing on a big new lake being built near the town. Whites have been buying up lakefront land from Negro farmers, but town backers hope to stop the trend by showing the value of waiting for an orderly plan of development once Gees Bend becomes a city. They even hope to reclaim some land already sold by condemning it for public use.

Legal aspects of forming cities can be tricky. Quotas of voter signatures must be obtained, and an election must be held. Gees Bend tried incorporating once before a few weeks ago, but the application was thrown out on a technicality. Other communities seeking cityhood include Mason City near Birmingham, Harlem Heights near Hueytown, Ala., a South Alabama town named Bellamy, which is owned by American Can Co., and Juanita, Ala., named for the late wife of a civil rights worker. Residents there have recently finished a Federally financed self-help home-building project and are seeking Federal aid for water and sewer systems.

It takes time for new cities to get on their feet fiscally, but where residents are poor anyway scrimping comes easy. Roosevelt City's seven policemen, all of whom hold other jobs, get $80 a month. At first they served six months without pay. The street department consists of four Neighborhood Youth Corps members, paid by the Federal Government. The biggest item in the street department budget this year: $250 for slag to fill potholes.

Next year will be different for all city departments. The biggest single income source will be the city's share of state gasoline taxes, expected to run $35,000 to $50,000, which must be used for roads. State whisky and cigaret taxes will also provide large shares of next year's income. So far the gasoline, whisky and cigaret taxes haven't been any help, because a city must be in existence a year to share in the take.

Current operating funds come from fines (the police car has more than paid its $2,700 cost in fines and court costs) and fees for doing business in the city. The fees have totaled $9,831.39 so far. Many businesses, like the fortune teller next door to city hall, pay at an annual rate of $1,000. Biggest contributor to date has been Alabama Power Co., which has paid $3,432.74.

Urban Problems — Housing

Top Priority Urged For Urban Housing

Critical Lag Spelled Out In Report

By John M. Barry

The President's National Commission on Urban Problems called on the nation to "put housing on the front burner" with an immediate five-fold increase in homes for low-and moderate-income families to at least 500,000 units a year.

The Commission urged an increase in "the total housing inventory" to 2 to 2.25 million units a year as against the current rate of about 1.5 million.

It noted that not even the goals of the Housing Act of 1949 have so far been met by the nation and that the federal government, for example, had torn down more housing units than it had built over the past ten years.

The 14-member panel on urban problems was headed by former Sen. Paul H. Douglas of Illinois and included Pres. John H. Lyons of the Iron Workers.

Its sweeping report to the President, totalling some 325,000 words in 1,500 typewritten pages, dealt with a wide range of urban problems affecting the nation's ability to meet its housing needs. It produced more than 100 specific recommendations in such areas as the need for uniform standards for local building codes, zoning and land use, restructuring of local government, construction industry practices, taxation and financing.

The overall report, based on the testimony of 347 witnesses at hearings in 22 cities since January 1967, had the endorsement of all members

Five-Fold Increase for Poor:

Urban Problems Panel Asks Top U.S. Priority for Housing

of the commission. But nearly all of the specific proposals provoked disagreement from at least some of the members in the course of the panel's discussions.

"If there is a sense of urgency and alarm in our report and our recommendation," the comission said in a summary, "it is because the commission saw the cities of our country first hand and listened to the voices of the people.

"The commission members certainly were not less concerned or knowledgeable than the average citizen, but after our inspections, hearings and research studies, we found conditions much worse, more widespread and more explosive than any of us had thought."

The urgent tone of the report was expressed in its finding that "about a third of the families in the nation cannot buy or rent decent housing at market rates by paying a reasonable proportion of their income."

"We must put housing on the front burner," the panel declared. "We must focus our housing programs on housing for poor people."

It called for giving local authorities "the tools and the money" to get the job done, urged an expanded role for the states, asked simpler federal programs and speedier processing by federal agencies, and urged "the utmost cooperation" from private industry.

"If all of these fail to bring an abundance of housing for poor people, then we believe that the government must become the builder of last resort," the commission said.

We hope this is not necessary but past neglect, unfulfilled promises, misplaced priorities and the consequences of failing to act give us compelling moral and practical reasons for proposing no less."

The commission summarized its major proposals as follows:

- "We urge a program for producing at least five times the present annual rate of low-income housing To do this we urge the removal of a number of barriers so that the housing industry can meet a larger share of the market.
- "We call for a mechanism that will provide regional and state uniformity in building codes and a system to develop standards that will be more hospitable to the research, testing and application of new building material and methods.
- "We cite many paths to reduce housing costs, these to include greater use of industrialized building methods, reduction of restrictive practices, methods for lowering land costs, and ways to reduce the expense of title search and other closing costs.
- "We urge incentives to encourage larger units of local government so effective and efficient home rule becomes possible. We do not believe the federal government can or should solve all urban problems.
- "New sources of revenue must be raised to meet our urban housing and related community needs.
- "We propose (1) a revenue sharing plan that gives credit to state-local tax effort and that provides for larger urban governments to obtain their share of this revenue directly from the federal government without state intercession; (2) streamlined property tax systems; and (3) new efforts to siphon off more community created land values for public purposes.
- "Finally, we urge numerous zoning proposals and land-use techniques designed to encourage more orderly urban growth."

The commission's report seemed clearly designed to stimulate extensive discussion of ways to solve the housing crisis, and many of its proposals were certain to provoke controversy.

Its plan for revenue sharing through block federal grants to states and cities, for example, already has brought a sharp dissent from Sec. Wilbur J. Cohen of the Depart. of Health, Education & Welfare.

Cohen, interviewed on NBC's "Meet the Press," said any such system was not "sound government," "sound economics" or "sound fiscal policy."

Cohen said it would be unsound for the federal government to "bear the burden" of tax collecting and then turn the funds over to the states "to spend as they wish without a definition of national priorities."

The Urban Problems panel itself took strong issue with proposals such as those put forth by Pres.-elect Richard M. Nixon to use tax incentives to spur greater participation by private industry in the task of rejuvenating the cities.

Such an approach, the commission said, "would be inefficient and ineffective" and could cause "a drain on the Treasury as great or greater than direct subsidies."

Craft Unions Stress Record On 'Prefabs'

Union craftsmen "will build and man any project that American industry can design," a representative of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. told the annual Building Products Executives Conference in Washington.

Speaking to more than 500 manufacturing executives in attendance, William J. McSorley, assistant to the president of the BCTD, also exploded "myths" that construction workers oppose progress in the building industry.

He cited a recent study, financed by the department, on prefabrication in the building industry, which found that in the long run prefabrication will open new opportunities to building trades unions.

"We have never resisted prefabrication per se," McSorley said, pointing to the fact that union members currently are building structures in Washington that are more than 70 percent comprised of prefabricated parts.

Elsewhere, McSorley told how union members handle the machinery that makes possible the movement of prefabrications, and how they use and welcome many other new techniques, tools and materials in construction.

U.S. builders struggle with costs

By Ed Townsend

Labor correspondent of The Christian Science Monitor

New York

The construction industry is digging in for more labor problems in 1969. The reasons:

- Wage bargaining with a majority of the industry's 3.7 million craft workers could push building labor costs even higher.
- Labor shortages are developing in New York City and elsewhere. These could delay projects and add to construction costs.
- Government may move more into construction labor problems through a wage-price restraint policy directed particularly at the industry, whose prices and costs are considered a major threat to efforts against inflation.

No industry is doing more self-analysis now, and none is under closer scrutiny from government. Changes are likely in relations with unions, in bargaining policies, and in building practices and work scheduling. They may come too late for 1969, but they are considered inevitable in the industry.

During 1968, wage rates for industry generally rose an average 18 cents an hour in the first nine months—but those in construction rose almost 50 cents an hour.

Wages climb

According to the Bureau of National Affairs, Inc., a private reporting service, construction wages climbed 8.3 percent in the year ending Oct. 1 to an average $5.17 an hour for all building trades. The rate of increase ranged from 6.1 percent (to $5.40 an hour) for plasterers to 9.5 percent ($5.77) for plumbers.

(Of seven principal crafts, the plasterers' 6.1 percent was followed by 7.3 and 7.5 percent for painters and laborers, 8.1 percent for bricklayers and electricians, 8.9 percent for carpenters, and the 9.5 percent for plumbers.)

At a recent United States Chamber of Commerce conference in Washington, Arron Sabghir of the Commerce Department noted that in 1967 and 1968 construction wage rates went up two or three times faster than in the early 1960's, while "construction output (productivity) continued to lag . . . in relation to overall economic growth." Mr. Sabghir cited figures to show that between 1958 and 1965 the gross national product rose 38 percent but construction productivity went up at a slower 25 percent rate.

Prices rise

"Even more unpleasant to report," Mr. Sabghir said, "is the fact that in the past three years construction prices . . . seem to have risen about twice as fast as prices in the economy as a whole."

During the meeting, industry and federal officials agreed that something should be done—quickly—to hold down contract settlements and price increases in construction. There was far less agreement on what might be done.

Joseph C. Garvin, an industry labor-relations specialist, and others urged new bargaining machinery (Mr. Garvin said "a genuinely coordinated operation") that would form a solid front of contractors to counter the unions' negotiating power. Mr. Garvin urged establishment of "a national federation of employers," perhaps similar to the bargaining organization set up by trucking employers nationally, that would have 12 regional conferences.

Argument countered

This argument was countered by a warning by Prof. Herbert Northrup of the University of California, who told the conference: "The wider the bargaining unit, the greater is likely to be the union power. . . . Widespread bargaining tends to bring all wages and benfits to top figures, adding to any inflationary impact."

For more than a year, many major contractors have advocated a new system of national or regional bargaining—but some at the conference in Washington said that such a change in bargaining policy is unlikely because of divisions within the industry itself. One contractor commented, "You can't get our people together in one big city, so how would you do it on a broader basis?"

Others had suggestions, including one for a "human-resources center," to handle manpower recruiting, training, and a list of craftsmen available for projects anywhere at a given time — to eliminate labor-force pressures likely to push wage costs up.

Conferees agree

The conferees agreed, however, on a chamber eight-point program calling for it to be "a catalyst . . . to draft positive programs" on industry problems. It is intended to improve "chaotic at best" relations with craft unions and to halt "spiraling inflation" in the industry while preserving the free collective-bargaining process.

Winton M. Blount, C of C president, warned that "unless the various segments of our industry unite in a common effort, we will soon find ourselves in a position which is, perhaps, irreparable." Mr. Blount, a contractor, said, "Labor costs in the industry are skyrocketing and, even as wage settlements are unbelievably high, productivity is declining at an alarming rate."

The chamber-of-commerce program includes efforts to attack manpower problems in the industry, to give the work force more mobility; to strengthen bargaining through more coordination and "full support of customers," particularly large industrial clients who press contractors to settle at any price; to eliminate restrictive building practices; to strengthen dispute-settling machinery; and, among other points, to reduce seasonal employment and "provide for more realistic scheduling of work."

Government interested

This last point is one in which the government has a strong interest. Craft unions often cite the seasonal nature of work as a reason hourly wages must be high. Unemployment in the industry ordinarily ranges nationally from 4 percent in summer to 12 percent in winter. In part, and in some areas, cold weather shutdowns of work may be necessary, but new building methods and materials make that less true year to year. There is wide agreement now that "seasonality" can be minimized—and work spread out over the year.

The Associated General Contractors, a national employer group, recently pledged to work toward this objective and to negotiate building contracts that would minimize costs of winter work.

Meanwhile, in a more significant action, President Johnson recently directed all federal agencies—as "major purchasers of construction," he said—to alter their method of awarding federal contracts in order

New Pledge Readied on Job Rights

From News Dispatches

The Virginia Highway Department is planning to submit a revised equal-employment assurance pledge to the Federal Highway Administration.

State Highway Commissioner Douglas B. Fugate made the statement in Richmond after receiving the report of Paul D. Stotts, assistant State attorney general, who conferred for 2½ hours Wednesday with Federal agency representatives in Washington.

Meanwhile, Federal and State authorities met yesterday with representatives of the Virginia Road Builders Association in hopes of ironing out differences over pledges that also are required of road contractors.

More than 50 company pledges that have been rejected as insufficient by Federal officials will be revised and resubmitted, a State official said.

As to the State's pledge, Fugate said he hoped the new form would satisfy Washington but added that he still feels some of the Federal requirements "go beyond the statute and intent of Congress."

The new form, he said, will be "in language which we hope will be acceptable but which will still maintain Virginia's position."

The pledges are required before Federal highway funds can be released to the states.

MIGRANTS' PLIGHT IN TEXAS DECRIED

Rights Panel Head Suggests Peonage Law Violation

Special to The New York Times

SAN ANTONIO, Tex., Dec. 12—The acting chairman of United States Commission on Civil Rights said today that many of the migrant farm workers in the lower Rio Grande Valley of Texas were living under conditions close to peonage or slavery.

The Rev. Theodore M. Hesburgh, president of Notre Dame University and commission head, told the commission staff to consider the testimony of the day to determine if the Federal antipeonage law might have been violated.

His comment came as the commission, in the fourth day of testimony on the ways of life of the 3.5-million Mexican-American people in the Southwest, turned from education to economics.

His remark was spurred in past by the testimony of Arnulfo Guerra, a Roma, Tex., attorney, that the Immigration and Naturalization Service was interpreting the law in such a way that between 44,000 and 150,000 "commuters" from Mexico cross the Rio Grande to take jobs while United States citizens are unemployed.

Mr. Guerra said also that the Texas Rangers and local officers in courts in Starr County had helped the growers break the 1967 farm strike.

Pastor Scores Rangers

The Rev. Edward Krueger, who was sent to the area by the Texas Council of Churches to be an observer, testified about being arrested and slapped. He had taken pictures of Captain Ay Allee and other Texas Rangers directing the movement of a train of produce past what had been a picket line before the Rangers arrested the pickets.

Father Hesburgh said he asked for a lawyer's opinion on the peonage law "because if they [the migrants] try to organize, they get thrown in jail and have to put up $500 bond, a third of a year's income, to get out."

Today's story before the commission was of 180 rural slum villages in this farming area, with no roads or utilities. The migrants live in the villages except when they travel north for four months of higher paid work in the fields of the upper Midwest.

The migrants, according to testimony, pay school fees and high interest rates on loans while earning $1.15 an hour or less. Their problems are further complicated by the fact that across the river await those who are willing to work for even less.

Long Patience Cited

Manuel Ramirez, a member of Volunteers in Service to America at Laredo, Tex., said that the march of 2,500 Texas workers to the International Bridge last Aug. 16 protesting the commuter system showed that the patient Mexican-American poor believed they had been quiet too long.

Some 2,500 Mexican nationals cross the border daily to work in stores and plants in Laredo, which has about that many unemployed at the same time.

Staff reports found that the border area was lagging behind the rest of the nation in industrial development and therefore in income growth.

Sam Lattimore, state coordinator of the Economic Development Administration, told of efforts to bring in industries to make better paying jobs in the region.

Joseph B. Andrasko, director of industrial relations, of the Vought Aeronautics Division of L.T.V. Aerospace Corporation at Grand Prairie, Tex., told of his company's program.

It enrolled 800 men from the lower Rio Grande Valley unemployment list for jobs paying $5,000 to $6,000 a year in Grand Prairie. The 500 mile movement of former farm and common labor workers and their four weeks of training called for the moving of 2,132 people, including 262 children of school age.

Ag Teacher Says Program Is Slighted

BY NELSON ANTOSH
Agriculture Editor

The president of the Vocational Agriculture Teachers Assn. of Texas feels there is a deemphasis of agriculture within the U.S. Office of Education.

Herbert Schumann of Needville doesn't believe it is a major problem, but rather a step in the wrong direction.

"We don't approve of this sort of thing," says Schumann. He expects a resolution to that effect to be presented before the national convention of agriculture teachers in Dallas Saturday through next Friday.

Upper Echelons

Schumann blames a reorganization movement within the upper echelons of the U.S. Office of Education. For example, within the past few months the office of the executive secretary of the Future Farmers of America has been changed from a full-time to a part-time status, as has the office of vocational agriculture education.

Also, convention members will be looking at the problem of a national shortage of agriculture teachers. Some Voc-Ag departments in Midwest high schools have been forced to shut down, says Schumann.

Texas at Brink

In Texas there are just enough teachers to fill needs. "We're at the brink now," says Wilbert Meischen of Austin, executive secretary of the Texas organization.

Part of the problem is that agribusiness is hiring college graduates with degrees in agriculture education.

This state has approximately 1153 vocational agriculture teachers, who are instructing some 54,000 high school boys and a few girls.

The girls can take voc-ag, but are not members of the FFA. The all-male organization refused a proposal at its recent national convention to admit girls.

Changing Times

The agriculture teachers are concerned with keeping up with changing times. One of their newest innovations has been training youngsters in agriculture - related industries — for jobs like veterinary assistants, greenhouse workers, and seed salesmen.

This new program has been the only significant area of growth in this state's voc-ag departments.

A current Texas problem is that some of the older voc-ag departments need funds to replace equipment that is either wearing out or becoming outdated, says Meischen.

Equipment is financed with matching state and federal funds, plus local contributions.

More Chapters

The agriculture teachers would like to establish more Young Farmer chapters in Texas. Currently there are 25[illegible]

This organization bridges the gap between high school graduation and mature - oriented organizations like the Farm Bureau, says Meischen.

Spend Less on Luxury, Cohen Urges Americans

By the Associated Press

Health Education and Welfare Secretary Wilbur J. Cohen says Americans should spend less money on third and fourth cars, yachts, cigarettes and liquor and more on social welfare.

He said this yesterday as he praised statistics showing that America's spending for health, education and welfare has doubled since 1960.

Charts and graphs Cohen explained at a news conference showed that total spending for these purposes by the private sector together with that of federal, state and local governments has gone from $79 billion in 1960 to $163 billion in 1968. The public portion was $112 billion.

Cohen said that during this period of Democratic administration the number of poor people in the country has declined from 40 million to 22 million, the high school dropout rate since 1963 has declined by 27 percent and infant mortality, death and disease rates have declined in many areas.

But he renewed previous pleas for massive increase in spending to improve education, combat poverty and generally improve the lives of Americans.

He agreed his proposals—such as doubling federal aid to education, raising Social Security benefits by 50 percent and equalizing state welfare payments—"would cost a lot of money" and require big tax increases.

He said he would like to see higher taxes on cigarettes, on third and fourth cars and on yachts. He wouldn't recommend much higher taxes on liquor, he said, "because then you get into rum-running," illegal liquor sales.

to spread work out through each year.

Worries about more government action stem from the growing public clamor for something to be done about building costs (labor contends that soaring land costs and higher interest and money costs are more to blame than wage increases).

Congress has under way an investigation of construction-industry problems that could lead to legislative proposals by 1970. Before that, perhaps early in 1969, the incoming Nixon administration may receive labor-management advisory - committee recommendations of specific steps that it can take. A subcommittee has been studying alternatives—with sometimes sharp debate.

URBAN Problems — Labor

Labor Helps Finance Plan To Rebuild Ghetto Homes

Program to Train, Hire Area Poor

St. Louis — Labor, management, a neighborhood group and the government have joined in a ghetto-rebuilding program financed in part by the AFL-CIO and designed to be a pace-setter for cities across the nation.

The goal is to rehabilitate 300 dilapidated houses in a 200-square block slum area over a 2-year period at a cost of about $4 million, with area residents doing most the rebuilding. Many of them now are unemployed.

Under contracts involving 14 building trades organizations and five contractors' associations, the residents will be trained to the extent necessary and given an opportunity to become members of the unions.

Dir. John E. Evans of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Urban Affairs was among representatives of government, labor and management on hand to announce the project at a press conference here.

He reported that the AFL-CIO Mortgage Investment Trust Fund has agreed to furnish interim construction mortgage financing to the amount of $650,000 to Jeff-Vander Lou, Inc., a neighborhood non-profit organization that initiated the project.

The Dept. of Urban Affairs oversees the operations of the fund, which was created by the AFL-CIO in 1964 to help finance the construction of necessary and socially desirable housing.

Jeff-Vander Lou gets its name from the fact that the area involved is bounded by Jefferson, Vandeventer, St. Louis and Delmar streets. Most of the residents of the area are Negroes.

Evans said his office has been working with Jeff-Vander Lou and other agencies here since June to set up the program. He indicated that the organization's close ties with the neighborhood were instrumental in making the project possible.

Evans also praised the St. Louis Building Trades Council and the contractors' associations for their work and cooperation in helping to plan the project.

He reported that building trades unions and contractors' associations in Boston have also signed agreements to train ghetto residents in rebuilding slum houses, and are expected to launch specific projects here soon.

Similar agreements are under discussion in Baltimore, Chicago and Gary, Ind., Evans said.

The principal enabling contracts in the project involve locals of the Operating Engineers, Plasterers, Cement Masons, Carpenters, Stone Workers, Sheet Metal Workers, Plumbers, Painters, Bricklayers, Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Laborers and Teamsters, and district councils of the Laborers and Carpenters.

The St. Louis employer groups involved are Associated General Contractors, Sheet Metal & Air Conditioning Contractors, Plumbing Contractors, Mason Contractors, the National Electrical Contractors Association, and Sharks General Contractors.

Labor Grant

The training of at least 150 workers is covered by a $176,500 grant from the Labor Dept. to Construction Job Opportunities, Inc., formed by general contractors in the St. Louis area.

A craft selection committee with equal representation from labor and management will review job applications and classify workers for the project.

Workers hired will be classified as qualified workmen, advanced trainees or trainees, according to previous experience.

Qualified workers will receive the current negotiated pay rate for their particular crafts. Advanced trainees will receive from 60 to 90 percent of journeyman pay, depending upon degrees of skill. The starting rate for trainees will be $3 per hour.

Trainees will be allowed to work across jurisdictional lines as helpers for six months after which they will be assigned to a trade as an advanced trainee. Union membership will be made available not later than the completion of the advanced trainee training period.

Area Ratio

The craft selection committee will determine the ratio of nonresidents to residents of the area to be hired, except that in no case will the ratio in the advanced trainee or trainee classifications be less than 1 resident to 3 skilled journeymen.

Michael L. Galli, director of the St. Louis Federal Housing Administration office, described the project as one that "we hope will be adopted in other neighborhoods and urban areas throughout the nation."

He said rehabilitated homes will be sold to residents of the area, using FHA below-market-rate interest programs. Most completed homes will be of the three- or four-bedroom size, selling at an average price of $13,000, with down payments as low as $200 and monthly payments as low as $60.

Urban Problems

What's the Status of Urban Uplift?

By MONROE W. KARMIN

WASHINGTON—No one knows for certain what President Nixon intends for two of the erstwhile Great Society's boldest experiments in urban development: The Model Cities and New Communities programs. But prospects for both now seem brighter than many Democrats feared during the election campaign.

George Romney, the new Secretary of Housing and Urban Development, has told Congress he regards the comprehensive Model Cities approach to slum uplift as "a great opportunity." A Nixon task force has recommended that Model Cities become the chosen instrument for aiding the urban poor. The Nixon Administration, particularly Vice President Agnew, has shown interest in furthering the movement to establish planned new communities as satellites to major urban centers. A spokesman for Mr. Romney now says that, despite the Nixon desire to find budget economies, "there's no disposition to chop (either program) down automatically."

The Republicans, in reviewing Model Cities and New Communities, will find that the departed Democrats have pushed both from the theoretical to the action stage. Just before they left, the Democrats at HUD pledged Federal support to nine Model Cities projects and one New Community, with lots more applications soon to be ready for decision. As it analyzes progress, Romney & Co. will make these discoveries about the two programs.

Some Problems and Plans

First, Model Cities.

—Most cities, which at first rushed forward with ambitious plans, now have appreciably scaled back their ideas, largely because of Federal budget restrictions. Seattle, for example, originally contemplated a $58 million combined Federal-state-private uplift project; now it is settling for a $19 million start. "Sure we're disappointed," says Walter Hundley, the Seattle Model Cities administrator, "but maybe it's better that we didn't get it all because we're going to have a hard time handling the $19 million."

—Though the 150 selected Model Cities have diverse problems, most have zeroed in on unemployment as their chief concern, with housing, educational and recreational improvements trailing behind. Most have delayed or abandoned the more adventurous social experiments with such goals as racial integration. "We're stuck on the basics, for comments Mr. Taylor, "but it must be tied into the larger, white system."

—The Model Cities program's most acute problem, however, is at the Federal level. Despite intensive Democratic effort, the coordination among Federal departments that is required for a comprehensive attack on slum blight is rickety at best.

Second, New Communities.

—Response to the new Federal loan guarantee for New Community developers, which came into being last August, is stronger than was expected, More than 70 inquiries from would-be developers have been received at HUD; about a dozen of these have been placed in the "serious" category and one in Illinois has been approved. "I've been pleasantly surprised," says Charles M. Haar, the assistant secretary who has been in charge of the program and is still on the job.

—Most of the applications, however, come from real estate developers, operators and investors who are already in the land business. HUD has not yet attracted major corporations normally not concerned with community development into the field, but there are indications that some corporate newcomers may get in.

—Most of the projects have been proposed for location near major urban growth centers (to HUD's gratification) and not stuck out in the prairies away from existing population. Too, officials have discovered that large tracts of land are already in the hands of developers and companies.

—The New-Community designs are more traditional than avant garde. There is more emphasis on giving value per dollar than on fancy architecture. Most of the plans feature recreation. "We may have some difficulty getting low-income housing built at the beginning," says Robert Paul, an aide to Mr. Haar. "The image everybody wants is housing around a golf course."

To Robert C. Wood, the departed HUD Secretary, the Model Cities and New Communities programs will serve as proving grounds by which to judge Nixon intentions either to build upon the Great Society's urban initiatives or to change course.

The Model Cities program, particularly, is poised for takeoff. Though it was first proposed in 1965, the Government is just now committing funds to permit chosen cities to begin slum-uplift projects. So far, nine communities have been given the go-ahead: Seattle; Atlanta; Baltimore; Boston; Denver; Huntsville, Ala.; Portland, Maine; Waco ety of aid programs into a comprehensive attack on a selected neighborhood's problems. Federal supervisors point to features of the Seattle plan as illustrative of what they are seeking.

Citizen participation: The Seattle project is the product of 10 citizen planning task forces working with volunteers from public and private agencies at the local, state and national levels. During seven months of meetings, more than 1,700 neighborhood residents participated in task force planning. Proposals approved by the task forces went to the Seattle Model City Advisory Council, composed of 86 representatives from neighborhood organizations, and then on to the mayor and city council for approval.

New neighborhood institutions: The Seattle project creates a variety of neighborhood institutions to aid the community. One is the United Inner-City Development Foundation, an organization of some 30 neighborhood groups, which seeks to develop new resident-owned businesses by acting as a middleman between residents and lenders. It hopes to get money from the Washington State Development Corp., from private sources and from Federal agencies such as the Small Business Administration.

Increasing Home Ownership

Similarly, a non-profit Housing Development Corp. is being formed to increase the supply of housing and the degree of homeownership in the neighborhood. The corporation hopes to bring in $6 million to build or rehabilitate 5,400 housing units in the next five years. The corporation will be owned by stockholders including business executives, public officials and local residents: Neighborhood shareholders will elect the directors.

Innovation: As a first step toward socioeconomic integration of the city's school system, Seattle plans to use Model Cities funds to plan a Middle School Education Park for grades five through nine, to be built, hopefully for a racially balanced student population, on the edge of the University of Washington campus. "In most cities integration is an uptight process that they didn't want to face," says Mr. Hundley. "We decided to face it."

Other approved Model Cities plans are using other approaches. Some examples:

Atlanta is assigning top priority to reducing unemployment in the target neighborhood from 15% to the city-wide level of 2.8%. Among other things, the Georgia State Employment Service will operate stations scat-

Most have delayed or abandoned the more adventurous social experiments with such goals as racial integration. "They've stuck to the basics, for the most part," says Ralph Taylor, the assistant HUD secretary who shepherded the program from its birth to the Republican takeover and is staying on temporarily.

—The major impact of Model Cities planning, so far, has been to create new neighborhood institutions such as housing and job development corporations that are involving slum residents more than ever in community affairs. A major problem now is the advent of the "community control" movement that, in many cases, seeks "black separatism" as a goal. "I'm not against black participation," came into being last August, is stronger than was expected. More than 70 inquiries from would-be developers have been received at HUD; about a dozen of these have been placed in the "serious" category and one in Illinois has been approved. So far, nine communities have been given the go-ahead: Seattle; Atlanta; Baltimore; Boston; Denver; Huntsville, Ala.; Portland, Maine; Waco, Texas, and Smithville-Dekalb County in Tennessee.

But other plans are progressing through the pipeline, and Mr. Taylor predicts the Nixon Administration could approve as many as 65 by June 30. New York City has been assured of $65 million for its three Model Cities projects if it completes necessary procedures by the end of June. Chicago, Detroit, Philadelphia, Pittsburgh and St. Louis all are expected to qualify.

The Model Cities program gives bonus Federal money to cities that pull together a variparticipated in task force planning. Proposals approved by the task forces went to the Seattle Model City Advisory Council, composed of 86 representatives from neighborhood organizations, and then on to the mayor and city council for approval.

Other approved Model Cities plans are using other approaches. Some examples:

Atlanta is assigning top priority to reducing unemployment in the target neighborhood from 15% to the city-wide level of 2.8%. Among other things, the Georgia State Employment Service will operate stations scattered throughout the target neighborhood to relay job information rapidly to residents. A job-mobile would transport residents to interviews: They would get funds for clothing, eyeglasses, dental work and anything else thought necessary to help them land jobs.

Residents of Waco's chosen neighborhood want to improve physical conditions in their community as their first priority. New streets, sewers and drainage systems are planned, along with stricter building-code enforcement to improve housing. A Resident Homebuilder Project would build new homes and train Negro residents to manage their own homebuilding firms. A Neighborhood Development Program would seek public and private funds to build 400 units of low-cost housing. An urban design center would help residents plan general community improvements, including parks.

The Smithville-Dekalb County program identifies poor educational opportunity (nearly half the county's students don't finish high school) as the root-cause of its problems. The county proposes extensive revamping of its school system, including higher teacher salaries, a strengthened curriculum, and emphasis on vocational education and remedial reading.

Denver's Projects

Denver's program contemplates 119 projects in 12 problem areas and includes such efforts as a rehabilitation center for hippies, expanded public defender services for the poor, a Metropolitan State College that would be oriented to serving the poor and minority groups, a recreation program to enable families to participate in activities as a unit, and a Youth Coalition to involve 16 to 21-year-olds in self-help projects.

The New Communities program, signed into law last August, seeks to stimulate the development of satellite cities, such as Reston, Va., and Columbia, Md., by easing the financial strain on sponsors. Officials figure that Government guarantee of debentures issued by the developers will enable them to borrow from private lenders at a cheaper rate and for longer terms.

Though it has not yet been announced, HUD has granted conditional approval for a $30 million guarantee to enable a group of sponsors, headed by the Illinois Central Railroad and developer Will Manilow, to begin a new community in Illinois. The planned city, expected to occupy 17,000 acres and house 100,000 people by 1980, will be built around a university center. Sponsors hope to attract substantial industry and a diversified citizenry. To qualify for the Government guarantee, says HUD's Mr. Haar, the sponsors had to expand their plans from what he describes as "mainly a smaller-scale residential subdivision."

When the Nixon Administration reviews Model Cities and New Communities, then, it obviously will be dealing not only with ideas but with projects well under way.

TIME AND SOUND

Union-Employer-Community Accord On Jobs

By ERNEST CALLOWAY

A breath of fresh air seeped into one of the tightest employment vacuums in the local economy with the recent tri-partite agreement among the building construction unions, the construction employers association and a neighborhood association operating in the Negro slums of north St. Louis. The memorandum deals with construction employment in the rehabilitation of 300 dilapidated houses in 200 square blocks of the northside ghetto.

The socially incongruous sight of highly paid, substantially all-white craftsmen on building projects in a poverty-stricken community with high incidence of employment has perhaps been one of the greatest sources of tension and despair in the black community. It is taken, and rightly so, as open contempt and visual proof of the hopeless inequities of the slum environment.

The prime value of the unique memorandum, despite its obvious weakness in scope and content, is the belated recognition of construction unions and employers that the winds of change are surrounding us, and survival can only be maintained by facing up to change instead of seeking to subvert it. Consequently, the real value of this initial accord is perhaps more psychological and educational than economic in any substantive degree. We can only hope that its value will increase both educationally and economically as experience gathers. In this connection future agreements could expand the area of employment and training as well as the nature of construction.

The essence of the three-way agreement relates to the rehabilitation of 300 residential units in the model cities area covered by the Jeff-Vander-Lou association. The construction work will be carried on over a two-year period at a cost of approximately $4 million of which the AFL-CIO Mortgage Investment Trust Fund has agreed to furnish $650,000 in interim construction mortgage financing. The rehabilitated homes will be sold to residents of the area.

The agreement provides for the hiring and training of area residents at a ratio of not less than one resident to three skilled journeymen. The plan creates three classes of workers: (a) qualified workers or those with the necessary skills, (b) advanced trainees or those with some construction experience, but who do not have full qualifications, (c) trainees or those without any previous experience. Qualified workers in the area will be paid the existing union rates of the particular craft. Advanced trainees are placed into groups having a range between 60 to 90 percent of the applicable journeyman's rate. Trainees will be paid $3.00 per hour. They will work across jurisdictional lines as helpers for a six month period.

The agreement creates a Local Joint Administrative Committee, composed of the various groupings, to handle recruitment of workers.

St. Louis unions involved in the project are: Carpenters, Brick-layers, Plasterers, Operating Engineers, Cement Masons, Sheet Metal Workers, Teamsters, Plumbers, Electrical Workers, Painters, and Laborers. Employers Associations include Associated General Contractors, Sheet Metal and Air Conditioning Contractors, Plumbing Contractors, Mason Contractors, Electrical Contractors and Sharks General Contractors. The U. S. Department of Labor is granting $176,500 to train at least 150 workers.

While it makes some significant advances in labor-management-community communications, the basic weakness of the agreement is in its scope: it excludes new construction in the same area, and over-tilts the scale in behalf of outside journeyman skills. Experience could possibly improve these defects.

Like any union contract, no agreement is worth the paper it is written upon unless the elements affected put life and vitality into it.

We believe a proper step has been made in a most complex industry. The agreement is unique and as a first step it can lead to a most fruitful development in job opportunities in the local building construction industry. Let us hope so. The unions, the employers and the Jeff-Vander-Lou Neighborhood association should be commended for this important first step.

Urban Problems — Unions

Supervisors' Patience Needed for Successful On-the-Job Training

In a recent speech to the National Petroleum Refiners Assn., OCAW Pres. A. F. Grospiron called on both labor and management to assume new responsibilities in an effort to solve the nation's social problems.

Another enlightened view on this subject is held by Detroit businessman Joseph L. Hudson Jr., presented in a lecture at the University of Michigan. Although he did not mention the union's role in finding solutions, maybe because his audience consisted of other businessmen, he does show some understanding of the problem.

"Many Americans receive a sort of education in reverse — an education for failure," he declared. "These people, whether hard-core unemployed or high school dropouts — and it makes little difference whether they are black or white — know that they are failures."

"When they are given a job they know that sooner or later they are going to be fired. So, the first time they are criticized, or the first time they make a mistake, they just quit and don't come back — and until recently nobody cared. Why should they? In the American tradition they had been given an opportunity, and they had failed. The business society had done its part."

Hudson noted that our production-oriented economy has difficulty accommodating the undertrained or marginal employe. "When a first-line supervisor is saddled with a potential problem employe, or a marginal producer, or an employe who is going to require a disproportionate amount of supervision," he explained, "the supervisor's own success is threatened by jeopardizing the production of his unit. As a result he views these people as albatrosses hung around his neck and may be more interested in their failure than their success."

The success of employment programs, he said, depends on something far deeper than merely educating or training the unemployed. "It requires the education of the trainers. It requires the education of the supervisors. And it requires a new set of management standards which will permit some sort of recognition or reward to the supervisor who does a successful job of integrating these people into his work force."

In facing the urban crisis, Hudson said, business corporations can play their most significant part in providing both jobs and training to the unemployed, the drop out, the ADC mothers, and others who cannot find or hold good jobs. But he emphasized such involvement must have effective follow-through.

Such an effort, while necessary, is also costly, Hudson admitted. But, he added, "It just makes good sense, common sense and business sense, to see that those elements of society which are a drain on our economy today become self-sufficient, positive contributors to our society and our economy tomorrow."

Emergency Action Urged To Meet Housing Crisis

Labor Cites Interest Rate, Land Costs

The AFL-CIO called for a top-priority, emergency program to meet the nation's "unpostponable housing needs."

Wage-earners have been priced out of the homebuying market by the soaring cost of money and land, the federation testified at Senate hearings.

John Evans, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Urban Affairs, said the interest rate on mortgage money "has moved from being a serious problem to that of a national disaster."

He told a Senate Banking subcommittee:

"We have watched interest rates skyrocket . . . and we have watched much-needed housing slip further and further from the grasp of those who need it most.

"We have watched government programs of assistance, so hopefully conceived, become badly eroded. We have watched wage-earners abandon their aspiration to escape substandard dwellings and, concurrently, we have seen a halt in the traditional upward mobility from renter to small home owner to bigger home owner.

"A terrible stagnation is settling over America, blighting the housing hopes of all but a fortunate few."

Evans urged the Senate panel to write into its extension of the federal housing legislation two provisions to ease the mortgage money squeeze.

One would authorize $5 billion of GI insurance funds to be used for veterans' mortgages at a 6 percent interest rate. This, he noted, would both help meet housing needs of returning veterans and bring a greater return to the insurance fund than it presently receives.

Labor Urges Steps to Meet Housing Crisis

In addition, Evans urged that the Federal Reserve Board be directed to purchase up to $5 billion in government-insured mortgages—thus freeing an additional amount for new home mortgages.

Evans charged that the accelerated tax depreciation loophole for real estate has forced up land costs by encouraging speculation.

"It should be ended forthwith except for low and moderate income rental housing," he urged. "Here, a tax break can direct the construction industry toward great national purpose."

Because of the limited supply of urban land, Evans said, the federal government should develop a national land reserve, with provisions for acquiring land and earmarking portions for low and moderate income housing similar to that in the urban renewal program.

"The best overall job of answering the needs of low income families is public housing," Evans said.

He praised provisions in an Administration bill to continue and improve the public housing program and urged that serious thought be given to public transportation subsidies to open up new areas for low-cost housing.

Evans told the subcommittee that volume production is the only means of bringing down the cost of housing.

He said that the AFL-CIO and its building trades unions "have readily accepted and adapted to hundreds of changes . . . aimed at faster, more economical methods."

There is, he said, no opposition on the part of AFL-CIO unions to innovations in the housing industry.

At HUD, a New Respect for History

By JOANN LUBLIN

FOR SALE: A decaying six-story building in New Haven, Conn., doomed to be demolished and replaced by a parking garage in a $29 million Federally funded urban renewal project.*

For three months in 1878 a lady telephone operator sat on a soapbox in a ground-floor room in this building and ran the nation's first commercial switchboard. Southern New England Telephone Co. long ago lost track of the original equipment; it has a replica exhibit downtown. The room is empty now, and a passerby sniffs: "The air in there must be historic."

Chances are the old building will come down, its significance memorialized with a plaque on the front of the parking garage. But the effort to preserve it, even for a little while, has a significance of its own: A departure from custom at the Department of Housing and Urban Development, popularly recognized as Washington's prime advocate of the wrecking ball.

It was HUD that postponed the New Haven building's demolition while historians from the Interior Department hunted for local preservationists who might buy the structure from the city and either relocate or restore it. In contrast, the usual HUD approach has been to tear down everything in a deteriorated urban area and rebuild in modern style—the bulldozer technique of renewal-through-removal that often gave HUD a black eye among architects and preservationists fighting to keep a city's distinctive character.

By no means does the New Haven reprieve signal a complete change of heart at HUD. Historic restoration still ranks comparatively low next to low-cost housing and downtown economic rejuvenation. And, despite the New Haven instance of cooperation with the Interior Department, a rivalry persists—HUD having renewal money (a $750 million Congressional authorization) and few historical experts, while Interior has trained historians and relatively little preservation money (a $32 million authorization, of which Congress has appropriated a scant $400,000).

HUD people shrug off Interior's fiscal frustrations. "They talk," says a HUD man, "and we put in the money."

Out of HUD's money, the 2,000-plus cities with urban renewal projects may seek up to $90,000 per building for historic restoration. The rest of the restoration cost is up to the city, but often it can write off this outlay as part of its required one-third share of the total bill for the renewal project.

HUD, in judging the authenticity of a prospective restoration, relies on the standards the Interior Department employs in compiling its National Register of Federally protected sites and buildings. The states nominate candidates for this list; currently it numbers more than 1,000. Paradoxically, preservationists rely on this very list in defending their treasures from HUD-financed bulldozers. When a listed building is threatened by the urban renewers or other Federal perils (superhighways, for instance), a 17-member Advisory Council on Historic Preservation steps in to help find ways of saving it.

Inclusion of the New Haven telephone building on the National Register has reddened some faces at Interior. But other choices need no apology: Henry Thoreau's Walden Pond in Concord,, Mass., the Brooklyn Bridge, and Robert Goddard's first rocket-launching site (on the ninth fairway of the Pakachoag golf course in Worcester County, Mass.).

HUD now refuses to okay urban renewal funds until the local government justifies its intended handling of sites and buildings on the National Register. But as recently as last spring—two years after historic-preservation legislation took effect—many regional HUD officers remained unaware they could turn down renewal plans which did not take these structures into account. And some local historical groups have lodged their aged schoolhouse or armory on the Register—then defied oncoming bulldozers from behind the Register's protection.

Thus in Grand Rapids, Mich., where $3,267,141 in HUD money has poured into a downtown renewal project begun in 1961, the only non-new building left in Vandenberg Center is the 81-year-old city hall, which boasts a six-story clock tower and the first concrete roof poured in the U.S. The city fathers want their old hall torn down, but the Kent County council on historic preservation secured National Register recognition for it from the Interior Department last June.

Too late, say HUD's officials. Explains George Karas, an urban renewal expert, referring to the Government's loans: "To suddenly change signals on the developers, telling them we are going to save an old building, means you've sold money to them on false premises—and sabotaged the whole urban renewal plan."

So HUD begged off blocking the Grand Rapids city hall demolition, arguing that the 1966 preservation law can't retroactively affect renewal plans approved five years earlier. (The local preservationists, who filed suit Tuesday against HUD and the city, will be in court next week arguing for a delay in the demolition while the Advisory Council on Historic Preservation hears their case.)

The Nixon-tuned HUD administrators, mindful of hometown cries of "Federal interference," also remark that if Grand Rapids residents cannot persuade their own city government to cancel destruction of the old city hall, "It raises the question of whether it should be saved."

A counter-argument, often expressed by Interior Department architects and historians, is that HUD should consider not the local but the national significance of a historic building—especially since renewal dollars are Federal tax money.

The new HUD policy of cooperating with the Interior Department's National Register has aggravated renewal-preservation woes in another way. While HUD maintains tenuous alliances with city planners, National Register people avoid them, relying instead on historian-architect teams or state liaison officers.

This infuriated local renewal planners in Derby, Conn., because they were not consulted when the city-owned Sterling Opera House, scheduled for demolition on a renewal site, was placed on the Register last March by the state. ("That's one of the strengths," says William Murtagh, keeper of the National Register. "The owner does not have to give his consent for a building to be put on the Register.")

HUD approved Derby's urban renewal contract in June, on the condition that planners justify demolition of the 80-year-old opera house before the Advisory Council in Washington in November. Now the city threatens to redraw its renewal plans and leave out the building, then tear it down and sell the land to an eager local bank. If no Federal assistance is involved, neither HUD nor the National Register could prevent the demolition of the opera house, where Lionel Barrymore performed and John L. Sullivan boxed—and the air is historic.

Is a breakthrough near in housing?

Broad spectrum of companies will bid to participate in HUD's plan to mass-produce low-cost homes

The real hurdle now is not technology, labor, land, or even mortgage money—but public acceptance

109 Washington St. is an unpainted, ramshackle frame house that lies directly in the path of a new highway in Stamford, Conn. Since January, it has been home to John and Daisy Scott, their six children and two grandchildren. Scott, an odd-jobs laborer for a homebuilder, pays $160 a month for a dilapidated, six-room apartment (one of several in the house) in a blighted, mainly black neighborhood. The screens are broken or missing, the foundation is crumbling, and a mere trickle of hot water runs in the tub. But John Scott is lucky; many blacks pay much more for less.

Multiply the plight of the Scott family several million times and you can almost hear the ticking of the bomb that could blow America's cities to bits. A major component of the nation's explosive social problem is housing; improve the environment in which millions of poor Americans live and you might defuse the bomb.

In fact, you could do much more. It's virtually certain that the Nixon Administration will make a thorough upgrading of the nation's housing stock a prime goal of policy for the years ahead. Given this intention, housing will be transformed from a stagnating industry into one of the most dynamic elements in the economy—comparable in economic impact to the train in the 19th Century and the automobile in the years after World War I.

Hitting a goal of 3-million units by 1975—the target announced by Herbert Stein of the Council of Economic Advisers—would unquestionably make housing the nation's premier growth industry. In contrast to the current $30-billion, spending for homebuilding would have to rise to at least $60-billion in five years, a growth rate of almost 20% a year.

Persuasion. This helps to explain some of the excitement over Operation Breakthrough, which has kept the lights burning late in many offices this week while companies rush to get bids ready for it before the Sept. 19 deadline. Breakthrough is Housing & Urban Development Secretary George Romney's bid to enlist U. S. industrial knowhow and capital in the effort to house families of low and moderate income under various federal subsidy programs. Companies will submit plans for various types of housing that can be mass-produced using assembly-line methods. The 10 to 20 winners will share $15-million in research and development grants from HUD, and win the right to place their prototypes in HUD's eight regional showcases.

An implicit goal of Breakthrough is to provide decent housing for the urban poor that would let them get out of the inner city and live closer to job opportunities as plants and offices spring up in outlying areas. Romney expects to "persuade" state and local governments to cooperate on zoning and codes, and to find sites for factory-built housing by promising top priority on their bids for other HUD goodies—grants for urban renewal, planning, sewers, roads, historic preservation. With this bait, Romney hopes to aggregate a big enough market for mass-produced housing to justify major capital outlays by industry.

Industry, for its part, seems eager to try. Some 1,300 representatives from more than 600 companies attended the HUD briefing on Operation Breakthrough in June. HUD officials say almost 900 companies have expressed interest in the program. Major corporations from the entire spectrum of U. S. industry are either readying bids or counseling bidders. Just about every big name in construction is in the competition, and scores of companies or consortiums have emerged primarily to bid on Breakthrough.

This much is clear: Breakthrough has drawn many companies into housing a lot earlier than might otherwise have happened—at least two years earlier, say some company spokesmen. Moreover, it's a long-term commitment. Nearly every company queried by Business Week insisted it was in housing to stay—whether or not it won the HUD contract. The housing industry will never be the same.

Critics. Despite all the bushy-tailed enthusiasm, there are pockets of cynicism, especially among traditional homebuilders. Many feel Romney has not yet faced the political realities of local zoning and union resistance, or the economic facts of financing, local taxes and land costs, and the expense of transporting factory-built housing from plant to site. Other critics insist that technology is not the problem, that precious time is a-wasting in Romney's prototype program.

There is general acknowledgement, however, that Breakthrough is at least forcing the nation to take a hard look at its spreading crisis in housing, and at the constraints that contribute to it.

Losing ground

The housing industry, which never fully recovered from the 1966 credit crunch, failed in each of the past three years to build enough housing to meet demand. This year, when the market easily could absorb 3-million units, less than half that number will be built.

There is little debate that the demand is there. Nearly every housing official can tell you how much low- and moderate-income housing is needed: Chicago wants 300,000 units; Atlanta needs 16,000; Dallas, 46,000; Denver, 37,000 by 1975; Los Angeles, 14,000 in the next two years; Miami, 10,000 now, plus another 20,000 over the next five years; Minneapolis-St. Paul, 40,000; Boston, 10,000, Philadelphia, 47,000 units over the next five years; and Pittsburgh wants replacements for 8,500 dilapidated homes and 35,000 deteriorated units. Even a small city like Stamford, Conn., needs 3,000 units over the next few years.

In New York City, Housing Administrator Jason R. Nathan spots his needs at 30,000 to 40,000 a year for the next decade. "Romney's proposal is the most important new direction . . . in the housing field today," declares Nathan. "The field of housing production is drowning in its own juices . . . You have simply got to find a radically different method of producing housing that will increase speed and reduce costs."

Squeeze. The resulting shortages—acute in many areas—have pushed prices on new homes and apartments beyond the reach of many middle-income families. Costs of land, labor, materials, and local taxes are soaring. Mortgage money is scarce, rates are high (some over 9% in California) and downpayments substantial. And only the cost of money has any chance of easing within the next year.

Families have begun to double up as they did after World War II. Rent controls, or demand for them, have cropped up again in many cities. New York City extended its wartime controls to postwar housing. Stamford, Conn., will get rent control this fall. In Passaic, N. J., a week of rioting followed an exorbitant rent hike by one landlord.

Slum housing is a major element in the frustration that makes powderkegs of U. S. cities.

Mass-produced housing, such as these units being assembled at a factory near Rochester, N. Y., is a principal ingredient of the prescription that HUD's George Romney is writing to cure America's critically ill urban complexes.

Prefab houses that are stacked and connected in 40 hours rent as public housing in Akron at $54 a month.

Romney sums up: "We've been losing ground in housing, and the shortages will grow. The existing housing supply is deteriorating faster than we are rehabilitating or building new units. It will get somewhat worse before it gets better."

Inventory. The President's Committee on Urban Housing (the Kaiser committee) put it plainly enough in its report last year: "About 7.8-million American families—one in every eight—cannot afford to pay market price for standard housing. About half these 7.8-million families are surviving on less than $3,000 a year."

The state of the nation's housing inventory is equally distressing. Of a total supply of some 65-million units, an estimated 6.7-million occupied units are substandard—4-million lacking indoor plumbing, and 2.7-million in dilapidated condition. Some 6.1-million units are defined as overcrowded (more than one person per room). And only about 2-million of the 6-million vacant units are in standard condition and available for occupancy—the nation's lowest available vacancy rate since 1958.

Against this background, the Kaiser committee recommended "a goal of producing at least 26-million new and rehabilitated units by 1978, including 6-million to 8-million federally subsidized dwellings for families in need of housing assistance." This goal calls for the industry to produce over 1-million more units annually than it is now doing. Romney believes that Breakthrough will give the na-

Unger

As the first Republican Secretary of Housing & Urban Development, George Romney, now 62, has set himself two tough goals: One is to gather more of the power a HUD Secretary is supposed to have over the once-independent agencies that were stapled together to make up his department. The other is to make a success of Operation Breakthrough.

Breakthrough is closest to Romney's heart. While the program was conceived and delivered by the Democrats in Congress against the wishes of Robert Weaver and the Johnson Administration, Romney took in the foundling, gave it a name, and adopted it as his own.

Romney is most at home with the language of promotion, production, and the hard sell. Marketing the Breakthrough concept takes him right back to his days of glory in Detroit, those years that made him a millionaire, made his name a household word, helped put him in the Michigan governor's mansion and—for a short time—made him a real Presidential possibility for the GOP.

But Breakthrough is a new kind of vehicle, and enthusiasm a rare quality in Washington. Skeptics among industry lobbyists and bureaucrats, who have seen dozens of housing programs come and go, remember only one—the original FHA insurance program, which backed suburban housing for millions of families—that turned out really well. Still, it is Romney's "thing," and his zeal in "doing it" has been rendered more effective by the tempering process of life in the capital.

As a new man in Washington, Romney had some minor run-ins with the senior Democrats who still run Congress. Now he is smoother, exuding the same missionary fervor but with less of the preachiness that irked many during his early months.

Romney contrasts sharply with his predecessor, Democrat Robert Weaver. The first Negro Cabinet official, Weaver was a veteran bureaucratic survivor who rose to the top—aloof, no boat-rocker, and a master of jargon who kept his neck tucked in. Weaver left HUD about as it was handed to him—a federation of fiefdoms retaining most of their autonomy, despite being part of HUD.

Romney's goal of actually taking command of the departments has yet to be realized: Such things are not accomplished between January and September. But he has assembled a top command group that meets almost daily, and which has been charged with making HUD work like a department. Romney gets a wide diversity of views from his three top officials:

- Under Secretary Richard C. Van Dusen, 44, is a Detroit lawyer and long-time political confidante of Romney. He focuses on internal management of the huge department.
- General Counsel Sherman Unger, 41, is a political associate of President Nixon from California who was given his pick of several top-echelon jobs. He chose HUD because he figures it is the agency that will move farthest and fastest into the problems of urban society, once the drop in Vietnam expenditures allows more to be spent on domestic programs.
- Assistant Secretary Samuel C. Jackson, 40, is a Kansan and a highly regarded black lawyer who put in many years with the NAACP. He came to HUD from the American Arbitration Center in Washington.

Time element. All three men have been working to reorganize HUD. Unger has pulled into a single "law firm" for Romney the lawyers who formerly reported to the chiefs of such agencies as FHA and Public Housing; they now report to Unger. Jackson, similarly, is assembling "most of the planning functions" from these agencies into his Office of Metropolitan Development.

Romney and his command group are working to consolidate some 13 HUD programs into five or six—hoping thereby to shrink the complexity of applications, to lump grant programs together, and otherwise cut the time it takes to get a project underway and completed.

Looking. Romney has one major top job still unfilled: Assistant Secretary for Mortgage Credit who is also Federal Housing Commissioner—head of FHA. Romney had recruited West Coast builder Ray Watt for the job, but the appointment never was announced when it became apparent that Watt's holdings were such that he couldn't eliminate the conflict-of-interest problem.

Romney has said several times that he had a man being cleared for the job. He wants a "production man" like Watt, presumably someone who knows the housing bureaucracy from having worked with it, and against it, as a private entrepreneur.

Construction Costs Less in GEORGIA

Get the details in this new booklet

The eleventh edition of the booklet Cost Data on Industrial Buildings in Georgia is now available. It contains costs and specifications on 33 recently constructed Georgia plants and a photograph of each. There is also a section dealing with the financing arrangements available in the state, many of which enable a firm to move into a new building with no capital outlay whatever. Your company may be blessed with a Georgia plant one of these days. Write for your free copy of this booklet and see how little it's going to cost you.

EXAMPLE: This new 142,240-square-foot candy factory fully sprinklered, fully air conditioned and equipped with refrigerated storage rooms and special humidity control systems, was constructed in South Georgia for only $7.77 per square foot.

tion a leg up on that formidable goal.

Gearing up. It's obvious that—due largely to conditions beyond its control—today's housing industry is incapable of responding to a mass market. Romney's predecessor at HUD, Robert C. Wood, now director of the Joint Center for Urban Studies, learned this much from the ill-fated In-Cities program, an earlier HUD bid for a systems approach to housing.

"We discovered that although we could get Apollo going, no single enterprise in the country could handle this sort of housing project," says Wood. "We have to produce 700,000 units of low- and medium-cost housing a year . . . It is economically feasible, but we have to gear up."

"Gearing up" for mass production would take the industry more than a year. Only a handful of conventional builders operate on a national scale, and the largest of these—Levitt & Sons, Inc., a subsidiary of ITT—last year produced only 6,800 units. Even among prefab and mobile-home producers, no single company ever turned out more than 30,000 units a year.

Cranking up the industry's capacity, patently, is no solution. The task Romney has set himself in making Breakthrough a success is nothing less than the creation of an entirely new housing industry, based on the principles which brought him his fame and fortune—mass-production and mass-marketing.

In his favorite role of proselytizer-promoter, Romney raises the hopes of many who see in his single-minded zeal the sort of force that just might trigger over the next few years a change in the way housing is made and sold. The success of Breakthrough, if it comes, will hinge on how well Romney manages to aggregate markets, to persuade people to accept mass-produced housing.

'. . . no single enterprise can handle this project . . .'

The real breakthrough, in other words, must come in local attitudes.

Legal hurdles

The man Romney picked to ramrod Operation Breakthrough is Harold B. Finger, a systems expert recruited from the space program. To Finger, the systems approach to housing means manipulating such subsystems as management, market, land, capital, planning, design, and long-term financing to produce the best possible environment at the lowest possible cost. Several of the consortiums formed to bid on Breakthrough combine these disciplines in ways entirely new to U. S. housing.

An Assistant Secretary for Research & Technology, Finger has the tough and sensitive job of tackling state and local governments on their zoning and building codes—in many areas, designed precisely to keep out the type of low- and moderate-income families that Breakthrough is committed to helping.

It takes a foolhardy politician to buck local opposition on this delicate subject. The mayor of Stamford, Conn., was deposed not long ago over his plan to scatter, small groups of low-income housing in middle-income neighborhoods. Quips

This is the housing that Jack built

The bureaucrat who has been most successful getting factory-built housing into place is, by training and instinct, decidely no bureaucrat. He is Jack Saferstein, 44, Metropolitan Housing Authority director in Akron, a blunt, arrogant, impeccably dressed merchant who makes a hobby of cutting bureaucratic corners.

Many city officials bemoan the difficulties in finding sites and winning acceptance for factory-built housing. "Jack just goes ahead and acts, stepping on toes if necessary," says an Akronite.

Saferstein's score is impressive. Since February, he has moved 120 families of low or moderate income into new, two-story town houses that cost $17,000 each (excluding land) and they rent from $47 for a two-bedroom unit to $54 for four bedrooms. Another 300 units are in various stages of building; the goal is 1,500. In less than two years, Akron's record for fast action has drawn $25-million in federal housing subsidies.

Like merchandising. Two years ago, Saferstein was president of a chain of Akron supermarkets while serving somewhat indifferently on the board of the local housing authority. When the director retired, Saferstein accepted the post. The merchant in him soon discovered that housing is no different from merchandising. "You have to come up with a program and sell it," he insists.

The first sales job is in Washington. "The money is there for the taking," he asserts. "You have to get there firstest with the mostest, as I've learned the hard way."

Next step is the local building inspectors. Saferstein took them to the plant of the manufacturer, Stirling Homex Corp., of Avon, N. Y. "I said, 'Make a list of everything that's wrong. Be hard-nosed.' And they were. Then we corrected everything. Then I said, 'Make another list.' We conformed. We fooled them, goddammit."

The unions were next. "Our houses are made in a union plant, and all the people who complete them on the site are union men," Saferstein says.

Critics. Local resistance? There is some flak from middle-class Negroes who say that a large unit will glut their neighborhoods and cause school problems. This is not a valid issue, local observers say; most of the Negroes moving in to the units already live in the neighborhood.

A civil rights group complains that Saferstein has not integrated neighborhoods fast enough. Saferstein replies that he cannot afford to buy much land in all-white neighborhoods. Says an observer, "Saferstein has moved carefully." Where he has moved Negroes into white areas, "he has not so far caused panic selling or a lot of hard feeling."

One reason for this is that there was virtually no low-income housing built in Akron until Saferstein got on the job. Thus, there has been no feeling of saturation, as yet, in any of the neighborhoods where the units have been placed. Usually he buys four to six houses and replaces them with 10 to 12 town house units.

"We build in a lot of aesthetics," says Saferstein. "Every neighborhood where we have been we have upgraded."

"I tried to lay a little more groundwork," he explains. "Maybe our public relations is better. Any flak we have received has been from people on the perimeter . . . but we've never had a project turned down."

Joseph Melchior, executive vice-president of the Builders Assn. of Greater Cleveland (where factory-built housing has yet to find a home), has his own explanation of Akron's success: "Jack Saferstein is a special case. He may not be so hot on public relations, but he gets things done, and that's what counts."

Rebuttal. Not surprisingly, Saferstein has his enemies. First, of course, are contractors, one of whom branded the instant homes "chintzy." Saferstein leads with his chin: "The contractors think the cotton gin isn't going to work—man will never get to the moon. They'd love to say, 'I told you it wouldn't work.'" Saferstein is still waiting for one to comeup with a program to match it. Says one observer: "They are not high-quality homes, but they are taking the pressure off the inner city, low-cost housing market, which most builders are not interested in anyway."

Jack Saferstein inspects 'instant' homes ready for completion at site.

Saferstein's achievements have won him a reputation in federal housing circles. "I have been invited to move into the Washington arena," he says. "I'm not interested. It is satisfying to accomplish something here."

Has Romney's Operation Breakthrough helped his program? Says Saferstein: "Our program helps Romney. After all, we're accomplishing things."

Philadelphia builder Richard Fox: "People will sell their children before they have their neighborhood rezoned."

The suburbs don't want 'cracker-boxes,'" says Edward E. Estkowsky, of Wisconsin's Dept. of Industry, Labor & Human Relations. "Then you explain 'They're not cracker-boxes, they're cheapie Taj Mahals,' but they still won't go."

Missionary. To sell the concept to local officials, Finger has signed up John Betz, former housing expert for the Urban Coalition, and onetime aide to Rep. Henry Reuss (D-Wis.), a power on the House Banking Committee. Betz is doing missionary work around the country. The level of cooperation has been mixed, but a number of statewide conferences have been held in California, Connecticut, Massachusetts, Washington, and other states. Moreover, state officials report requests from many cities that want to be considered for one of the eight prototype show case sites.

Many states have enacted new laws on statewide zoning or building codes that will help ease the way for Breakthrough. New York's Urban Development Corp. has authority to override local zoning and building codes, and to raise money. Connecticut's new statewide general building code becomes effective Oct. 1. California's new law on factory-built housing breezed unopposed through the last session of the legislature. And Ohio's new model building code provides a procedure under which a manufactured-housing unit may be certified under the state law, thereby bypassing local building codes. Statewide codes—usually based on performance rather than specifications—are being weighed in Massachusetts, Illinois, Wisconsin, Michigan, and other states.

There is some support for a national building code, but such a code would need teeth. In Canada, where there is a national code but local option, Alcan Design Homes, Ltd., has not been able to place its factory-built housing within 20 mi. of any major city.

Hope. Resistance and skepticism aren't hard to find at state and local levels. "It's opening up every can of worms there is," says Howard Landers, director of planning for Metro Denver Fair Housing Center. And many officials share the worry of Pittsburgh's director of planning and development, John Mauro, that "there is still no commitment from the federal government to provide a smooth flow of funds on a long-term basis."

But here and there, Romney sees rays of hope for Breakthrough. For example, two weeks ago the Los Angeles City Council voted to kill a recommendation by its Building & Safety Committee that criticized Romney and refused to lower building-code standards, which are among the nation's toughest. In rejecting the report, Councilman Marvin Braude explained: "There's an implication that we can't improve and don't want to innovate, and we don't want to convey that impression."

Adds John Tolan, deputy for development in the San Francisco mayor's office: "The basic feeling here is that the Breakthrough approach is going to come, and why not now."

Land and money

Many officials share the feeling of Pittsburgh's Mauro that HUD has overlooked "the main problem of older urban areas—it's difficult to assemble land." Finger has said HUD will consider use of "available" federal land if it is proposed by the locality. But the only HUD aids for acquiring and improving land come through urban renewal or public works. And soaring land prices have placed many urban tracts beyond practical use for even high-density low-income housing.

Despite this handicap, several states have been able to identify enough land for a meaningful attack on low- and moderate-income housing problems. Some states provide financial tools of their own. Connecticut, for example, pays two-thirds of the cost of acquiring and improving sites for this type of housing. In the two years since this law was passed, the state has identified and started planning on 90 sites.

Similarly, a recent study by the Regional Plan Assn. for New York's Urban Development Corp. identified 210 sq. mi. of vacant land within a 30-mi. radius of midtown Manhattan that could take 470,000 residents under current zoning, and 1,360,000 if rezoned for higher densities. "We can provide ready-made markets for what Mr. Romney can produce with subsidies," says Robert McCabe, general manager of UDC.

Better market. But Romney can only produce what Congress appropriates, and so far this year, his requests have not fared too well on Capitol Hill. He sought funds to start 425,000 units under various federal programs in the current fiscal year, but the House of Representatives cut 20% each out of home ownership and rental project interest subsidies, and it cut the rent supplement program in half. Romney hopes the Senate will restore some of that.

Government can't escape some blame for the present tight money crisis, but it also deserves some credit for the orderly state of the mortgage market. Bad as it is, 1969 is no repeat of 1966, when the money well ran dry.

New policies at the Federal Home Loan Bank Board have brought greater stability and liquidity to member savings-and-loan associations, while permitting S&Ls to expand both their lending and borrowing powers. One result: S&Ls actually increased mortgage lending in July, despite a net loss in deposits.

Similarly, the Federal National Mortgage Assn. (Fannie Mae), now a "private" organization whose borrowing no longer affects the federal budget, has been pouring much more money into the mortgage market than ever before. (It does this by buying existing loans, thereby permitting lenders to make new loans at today's higher rates. Fannie Mae is expected to feed $6-billion to $8-billion into the mortgage market in 1969, versus $2-billion in 1966.

Response. Romney hopes to tap new sources of mortgage money with HUD's new securities, which he expects to market in $100,000 denominations in a few weeks, on a "pass-through" or private-placement basis. (In this way, they won't compete with other government-backed securities in the open market.) These new securities, participations in pools of government-insured mortgages held by either Fannie Mae or private investors, are a response to the clamor for new credit instruments to attract institutional and corporate investments to the mortgage market. At present, mortgage funds come mainly from savings of individuals.

Last month, a Presidential Commission on Mortgage Interest Rates, headed by Harvard economist James S. Dusenberry, called for federal measures to insure that "the share of the output required to meet the nation's housing needs is shifted away from other sectors and into homebuilding."

The union gap

Money, or the lack of it, is a principal reason why Romney's mass market could not be served now, even if it were wrapped up and tied with a ribbon. Another is organized labor, which has little patience with Operation Breakthrough—or with Romney.

Systems expert Harold B. Finger is ramrod on Operation Breakthrough.

"We're wasting a helluva lot of time in all sorts of experiments and investigations," says C. J. Haggerty, president of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. Haggerty asserts that Romney's major efforts so far have been with "graphs and flip charts," and he adds: "We're sick and tired of these smart boys with their damned pointers."

Haggerty's words reflect the general attitude in the building trades, that government hasn't yet demonstrated it has a plan for low-cost housing that it is determined to carry out—and that it can. The unions also are annoyed at what they consider Romney's lack of expertise. Says Haggerty: "Romney doesn't know the first thing about construction, and he shows it. Worse, he doesn't have a single construction man at the top, advising him."

Raising questions. It's no new experience for Romney to be slighted by organized labor. When he campaigned for governor of Michigan, he showed up at the Labor Day parade, even though the unions had asked him not to. He walked along the route shaking hands and greeting participants.

In the case of the building trades, however, it's easy to see why there might be hard feelings, after the all-out attack Romney launched on craft unions, which he blamed for the critical shortage of housing, and for which he was loudly booed.

But, deliberately, he has honed fine some questions on the part building-trades unions may be playing in slowing progress in home construction. For example, have unions forced wages so high that housing is priced out of the low and even moderately priced markets? Are Americans being denied cheaper, better housing because of the unions' restrictive practices? Is a shortage of skilled labor—planned to protect workers' seniority and the long-term availability of building jobs—contributing to construction inflation, and to the problems of cities?

Such questions—by no means new—are even more widely debated now as a result of Romney's attack.

Slow door. The building trades certainly are vulnerable to criticism. Construction industry settlements so far this year have been at a rate of 14.2% a year over two or three years, with an average increase in pay alone of 15.2% this year. This is more than twice the rate of wage hikes in manufacturing, 6.6%. And for many crafts it means around $6,500 added to annual pay by the time contracts are next renegotiated in 1972. The Nixon Administration is deeply concerned.

Moreover, many of the crafts have been criticized as the slowest to throw doors wide open to job-hungry minorities. But perhaps it is an exaggeration to blame this entirely on race: There isn't a big increase in white apprentices, either.

Contractors say there are 3.8-million building trades workers now, many of them of advanced age and due to leave the work force in the next few years. The National Assn. of Home Builders estimates that there will be a need for 400,000 new workers annually in the building trades between now and 1975 to fill new job requirements and replace those leaving the work force. But contractors say only about 16,000 are entering apprenticeship programs each year.

The AFL-CIO's director of urban affairs, John Evans, told Congress in July that "we have the manpower available to do the jobs we are called on to do."

Making up. Building craftsmen defend their high wages and perennially big set-

"Yes," says your accountant. "Leasing frees working capital."

"Yes," says your bookkeeper. "Leasing simplifies paperwork, and assures accurate tax records."

"Yes," says your psychiatrist. "Leasing takes the headache out of buying and selling a car."

"Maybe," says the local member of Chrysler Leasing System. "Let's talk it over."

Leasing is right for some people but not for others. To see if leasing is for you, see this full-time leasing professional. He can write any kind of lease on any kind of vehicle. One unit or 100. And because he's part of a nationwide network, he can arrange delivery and service in almost every major city. You'll find him in the Yellow Pages, under "Auto Renting and Leasing."

tlements on two grounds: the long time spent in apprenticeship, three to five years; and the time lost due to the seasonal nature of construction work in many areas. A New Jersey union leader said: "We need the same amount to live on whether the job's down because of weather or wide open; we've got to get insurance for rainy days in our pay for the good ones." If construction workers have to be off 600 hours a year (unions say that's the average time lost), they must earn $4.95 an hour to get the same annual pay that workers with stabilized employment—2,080 hours a year—receive at a $3.50 an hour rate.

There are fallacies in this union argument, of course. Many of the lost hours are recouped through overtime work at time-and-a-half or double time. In fact, heavy overtime is standard for many construction workers: They expect, demand, and get it. And a craft worker whose rate is $6.50 an hour actually may average $8 to $9 or more, because of overtime, thus boosting building costs.

AFL-CIO contends that if low- or moderate-income housing is being priced out of the market, it is because today at least half the cost of a new house is for land and for mortgage costs. The federation's Evans told Congress that money costs must be brought down and a housing land reserve established—for a writedown of land for low- and moderate-income housing—to meet "unpostponable housing needs."

Safety valve. Unions reject the suggestion that it is they who are delaying industrialization. "There is no opposition on the part of AFL-CIO unions to material innovations, new sizes of equipment, new methods of installation, or new tools," insists Andrew J. Biemiller, the federation's legislative director in Washington.

As "but one example of the great degree of prefabrication already achieved in the homebuilding industry," Biemiller cites "dwellings totally union-made by the Stirling Homex Corp. under contract with the Carpenters," erected in Akron, Ohio, to cost $17,000 to $18,000 (including the site) for three-bedroom townhouses. They are "assembled on site in a matter of hours . . . with factory-assembled wiring, plumbing, kitchens, bathrooms, and central heating," he says.

To Biemiller, this new type of housing is preferable to the "amazing growth in manufacturing and sale of mobile homes." Biemiller comments that the rise in mobile homes "represents . . . a safety valve which tens of thousands of families have turned to because of their inability to obtain adequate conventional housing."

Perhaps the "amazing growth" is a factor in the building trades' willingness to "fully support new concepts and new modes of housing" and "revolutionary* techniques." These unions get few jobs when a mobile home is wheeled to its site; but they can count on foundation work and at least 200 manhours of erection and connection work for every Stirling Homex or similar modular home that is erected.

Right time. Another factor could be involved in the building trades' more expansive policy toward factory-built housing, though the craft unions play it down: When Walter Reuther and the United Auto Workers quit AFL-CIO and developed an alliance with the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, both UAW and IBT talked about backing "massive" low- and moderate income housing programs. Reuther suggested the answer might be more mobile homes (UAW has plant contracts where mobile homes are manufactured). The two unions, in their Alliance for Labor Action, say pretty flatly that if the building trades did not put up more and cheaper homes, ALA would do it.

The building trades want no war with the truckers' union—IBT can shut off supplies to contractors. They are even less interested in having Reuther in the industry.

But probably more crucial than any other factor, the craft unions are starting to realize that the time is right for a revolution in building techniques, and that the unions must accept change.

Before Stirling Homex, or the lively public interest in prefabrication to help with urban crises, or even the threat of Reuther and the ALA, the United Brotherhood of Carpenters & Joiners was quietly signing plant contracts to manufacture housing units on an assembly-line basis, using lower-skilled workers (many are women) at lower wage rates.

One other consideration: The union is under outside pressure to open its rolls to minority workers and, from its members, to maintain job stability (that is, to keep down the number of carpenters). It can take in minority people for unskilled or semiskilled industrial-type jobs. But Carpenters membership for these workers won't qualify them for carpenter jobs on building sites. Maurice Hutcheson, president of the Carpenters, says such workers won't be any nearer journeyman (craft) status than "someone just off the street."

The Carpenters is the biggest union in AFL-CIO's building-trades bloc; its 800,000-plus membership is about 30% of the department's strength. When it moved into the housing factory, and stamped its union-made label on Stirling Homex units, it was in a powerful position to insist that other unions collaborate in putting the homes together on the site, to make them 100% union-built housing.

Two crafts became critical—the plumbers and the electricians. In Akron, these crafts dragged their feet for a time. The Carpenters sent persuaders from Washington, and the work started moving briskly.

Exceptions. Whatever the reasons, major breakthroughs have now been made in craft acceptance of and cooperation with prefabrication and modular construction methods. As long as there is work enough for all craftsmen, the acceptance and cooperation will grow. But it must be emphasized: This is now just in houses and low-rise apartments.

Contractors still contend that various craft unions require work to be done on-site in commercial or industrial construction or on high-rise apartments, although factory cut or prefabbed products might be both better and cheaper. Generally, such restrictions are local. But reasons for restrictions often tend to be forgotten in labor cost disputes, just as the significance of restrictive practices often is exaggerated to include other kinds of housing.

This applies, too, where tight craft lines are concerned. For example, under New York City building contracts, practices, and codes, members of no fewer than seven or eight and perhaps as many as 11 different crafts are required to install a single, simple bathroom in an office, hotel, or high-rise apartment. And disputes occur: One a few years ago erupted between the carpenters, with jurisdiction for hanging doors, and the plumbers, with jurisdiction over bathroom fixtures. The question was over which union should screw in a robe hook on the side of a door; it was a small thing—but there were some 4,000 doors involved.

A factory-assembled bathroom could be installed with half the cost and bother—but not in big New York projects. It might be another matter if prefabricated or modular housing, for low-and-moderate-income families on a public housing basis, entered New York with a "rise" limit of two, three, or four floors. Nobody will say for sure, but there's some understanding that the unions would sanction the installation.

Einar O. Mohn, director of the Western Conference of Teamsters in California and one of the top vice-presidents of IBT, sees prefabrication as the best route to lower housing costs, but recognizes its problems. "To accomplish anything like that means having to poke a lot of sacred cows on both sides, labor and business," Mohn concedes.

"As many as 11 different crafts are needed to install a bathroom. . . ."

Matter of taste

After all the sacred cows and other cattle have been prodded to the waterhole, getting them to drink may prove even more troublesome. In other words, it's one thing to build a better low-cost prefab, quite another to sell it—especially to low- to moderate-income families.

Aggregation of markets, as HUD is trying to do, will give some housing entrepreneurs the numbers they need to justify the risk of tooling up. But mostly they won't tool up for radically new approaches to housing. "People are not ready to accept a revolutionary product," says David Stirling, Jr., president of Stirling Homex Corp.

Resistance. Not surprisingly, a major boast of factory home builders is the blend-ability of their product. "We scattered two of them in Toledo," a Wisconsin builder says of his modular houses, "and they couldn't be picked out of other homes in the area." Donald Merriman, president of U. S. Affiliates in Tustin, Calif., says: "We want our homes to look just like the more expensive, conventionally-built homes. New materials bring too much resistance from buyers and from building codes."

Conformity in appearance, housing officials and builders hope, will overcome any hesitation due to use of unconventional building techniques. Unfortunately, it is already clear that the result in many cases will perpetuate what, to a cultivated taste, is appalling mediocrity, if not outright vulgarity. In Detroit, for example, the most tasteful exterior of several modular housing demonstrations belongs to the project built by Dallas-based Redman Industries, Inc. But, says a local housing official, it's not very popular—it doesn't use brick.

Cost and output. The question of construction cost, then, comes down to the question of how much cost can be squeezed out of fairly conventional, box-like living spaces, esthetically acceptable inside and out. "There is just no major cost breakthrough left in housing unless you form them out of some new material and they come out looking like igloos," insists Robert Smith, marketing director of Boise Cascade's Kingsberry Homes Div.

On one point, there is general agreement: "There is no such thing as low-cost housing," says Stirling. HUD's Finger agrees. Rising costs of materials and labor make it impossible, even with more efficient methods, to produce acceptable housing that low-income people could afford on their own. The goal of the "low-cost" exponents is actually producing housing as economically as feasible that will qualify for government subsidy programs.

Thus, the main rationale for assembly-line building methods—over the near term, at least—is not lower cost, but simply higher output. The national supply of trained, building-trades labor is nowhere near large enough to cope with the demand for housing, and there is not time enough to train more workers adequately. It's imperative that the skilled trades be used more effectively.

"Labor is hard put to keep up with the demands of building now," says James

Rockefeller OK's new tax credit

Offers business-tax deductions for production facilities in New York.

Governor Rockefeller of New York has signed into law the latest in a series of tax benefit measures to encourage more manufacturing in the state.

The bill provides a one-percent business-tax credit for manufacturers who build new plants, or modernize or expand existing facilities in New York. This tax credit on new construction and equipment can be deducted from either the corporate franchise tax or the unincorporated business tax.

For example: On an investment of $10,000,000 in a new, expanded or modernized plant, you can deduct $100,000 from either business tax.

If the credit exceeds the total tax for one year, it can be carried forward into subsequent years.

This new tax benefit applies not only to investments in new or expanded buildings, but also to investments in equipment and facilities used for production purposes with a useful life of at least four years.

This new tax credit is available immediately—with no red tape, no delays! For more information, fill out and mail the coupon below.

Gilbert, who heads a new consortium of concrete companies. "If building doubles, there won't be enough men to go around."

The arithmetic is compelling: "A builder we know can count on rounding up 10 men for a job; in a year he can put up 20 houses;" says Anson McAdams, a National Homes vice-president. "With our modules, he can put up 200."

Speed is key. This is a major argument for industrialization. Complex jobs can be broken into simple steps, and divided up among unskilled or semi-skilled workers. People capable of such work can be quickly trained. A lot of houses can be built in a hurry.

Building houses faster also can reduce one of housing's big cost items—the cost of money. "You get in earlier . . . the return comes earlier," says Richard Nalbercker, business development manager for Walter Kidde & Co., Inc. "That's important for construction loans, especially state loans."

Building a lot of houses faster may, in the long run, be the route to what can truly be called low-cost housing. Now the huge excess of demand for housing keeps prices spiraling up. "Industrialized housing will stabilize the housing market," says Stirling. Normal, competitive pressures, coupled with national economic growth, will reduce the relative cost of housing. "Then—in five or ten years," says Stirling, "we may have low-cost housing."

Tools for the housing revolution

The concrete box and the pipe-frame module may never entirely replace the old stick-built house, but the shelter revolution is under way. Techniques are being developed—and increasingly applied—to provide mass housing quickly for millions of low-income and moderate-income families. Ultimately, these methods may dominate the entire housing industry.

Despite the problems of economics, politics, labor, and esthetics, the technology of assembly-line homebuilding is emerging so rapidly that it is attracting many of the country's biggest companies—and not just builders. A shakeout is inevitable, but the ideas will survive. Those most likely to succeed generally fall into two categories:

- Wood or steel-framed modules, manufactured like postgraduate mobile homes, transported on flatbed trucks, then stacked and connected on site.
- Precast concrete systems—usually prefinished walls and floors or complete modules—made in remote or on-site plants.

The bulk of factory-built housing already in place today in the U. S. has been made by the wood-stud method. Stirling Homex Corp. of Avon, N. Y., for example, has 1,150 units in place in Akron, Syracuse, Rochester, and West Henrietta, N. Y., plus an order backlog of 3,000 units in six cities. It is negotiating other contracts in 24 cities.

Similarly, Modular Structures, Inc., of Bethesda, Md., has completed over 300 units in Amherst, Mass., and is now developing a 148-unit cooperative complex, designed by architect Paul Rudolph, in New Haven, Conn. MSI, too, is in a Breakthrough bid with Hercules, Inc., architect Tiffany Armstrong, and investment bankers Harlan, Betke & Myers, Inc.

And don't forget the ubiquitous mobile home; some 400,000 will be sold this year.

Other methods are getting a smaller but promising play. A growing number of module builders are turning to steel and aluminum for framing and floor joists, and others are pushing ahead with plastics for structural components.

Concrete's edge. But the big thrust in research and development is in concrete systems—especially for high-density urban housing. These concrete techniques can not match frame box systems for on-site construction speed, but backers say they are more durable and, in the long run, will prove much less expensive. Concrete's advantage: It is the cheapest building material, a good insulator, and fire-resistant.

Concrete high-rise apartments have long been factory-built in the Soviet Union, France, Britain, and Sweden to fill the post-World War II housing gap. In the U. S., one of the few concrete building systems to achieve wide acceptance to date is one devised by Boston architect Carl Koch and structural engineer Sepp Firnkas. Called Techcrete, it was first used in 1965 for a 200-unit project in Boston's Roxbury section. Since then, 1,000 more units have been finished, and Koch is readying two more major projects—one in Detroit and the other near Coney Island in New York. Techcrete uses precast wall panels and prestressed concrete beams that permit spans of 32 ft. Steel rods under tension lock the elements together.

Koch has put together a consortium to bid on Breakthrough, and he expects to win. "I think we have the only American urban-type housing that is really off the ground," he says.

Competitors. Several European concrete systems—Sectra, Balency, de Pondt, Jespersen, and Bison—are making inroads through U. S. licensees, and also figure in the Breakthrough competition. Concrete, Ltd., producer of the British Bison system, is consulting with Aluminum Co. of America, and some version of the Bison system will be in Alcoa's bid. The de Pondt system will be used on a 500-unit apartment project in South Chicago.

new consortium—Precast Systems, Inc.—organized in June to bid on Breakthrough. It was formed by 41 prestressed concrete companies, sponsored by Martin Marietta Corp., and others, and is headed by Blakeslee President James Gilbert.

Both Balency and Bison are based on factory-cast concrete panels that are completely prefinished, inside and out, including windows and wiring. Precast Systems, like Koch, will do most finishing on the site, while U. S. Gypsum will prefabricate the nonbearing walls.

Cutting weight. Several U. S.-developed systems aim at overcoming concrete's biggest handicap—weight. One developed by the National Assn. of Homebuilders reduces panels from the usual 145 lb. to 90 lb., and has been demonstrated in a townhouse cluster in Washington.

Stressed Structures, Inc., uses a module system and a new cement, Chem-Stress, which expands as it dries, building in stresses that help it withstand compressive loads. This allows the company to reduce wall thickness from the normal 6 in. to 2 in. According to Executive Vice-President John Lowell, the modules can be stacked 45 high. But critics contend the cement is still experimental, and they dispute the company's cost claims.

A different approach to slicing weight is a three-dimensional checkerboard arrangement being tried by Building Block Modules, Inc. The Oakland (Calif.) company casts four-sided, open-ended modules with 4-in.-thick walls, and stacks them so that the roof of one module becomes the floor of another that is formed by the space between modules. This eliminates double floors and walls, but requires a lot more on-site work for finishing the units formed by the free spaces. So far, the young company has built a small project in Oakland and started another nearby.

Objections. Elsewhere in Oakland, an 11-story apartment building has been erected using a system called Foldcrete that combines the ease of casting panels with the speed of installing modules. Wall panels are cast flat, at the site and adjacent to the roof panel. They are joined to a roof by steel hinges linked to reinforcing bars. When a crane lifts the roof, the walls fold down and are bolted at the corners to form the module.

For all the innovation, concrete's detractors argue that its simplicity and low cost start to disappear when interiors and exteriors are dressed up to appeal to the American consumer. Koch, a leading concrete advocate, answers that "we have reached the last economies we can in wood construction. But concrete "still is in its rudimentary stage," he adds, and "any further organization in its manufacture will make a tremendous difference in cost."

Factory pluses. Concrete or wood, the advantages of building in a factory, on or off the site, are enormous. Rainy days do not stop production, and work can go on Precast panels form walls in a 1,200-unit project in Boston. Concrete system devised by year-round. Temperatures can be controlled so that tricky materials, such as epoxy, can be used safely. And things such as compressed air or glue become centralized services, like electricity. Equally important, losses of materials through carelessness or theft can almost be eliminated. Such losses, says one builder, are "usually around 15% of the gross."

Putting a wood module together in a factory is much like building a house the on-site way—only a lot faster. As the floors roll down the production line, prefab walls and ceilings are nailed in place, prehung windows and doors inserted, preassembled plumbing "trees" installed, cabinets hung, and appliances added. Increasingly, kitchen, bathroom, and heating "packages" are simply dropped into place. Even carpeting or linoleum goes down in the factory.

All lumber and facing is precut. Jigs and fixtures are used in assembling wall frames. At the Lafayette (Ind.) plant of National Homes Corp., a set of wheels 16 in. apart rolls over a wall frame to spread glue on studs, waits for the wallboard to be laid on, then rolls back spitting nails.

Carl Koch and Sepp Firnkas is a leader among new factory-built housing techniques.

Members of a roof truss are set in position, then knocked together in one clout by power hammers at each joint.

Not all module builders have taken the production-line approach. Northwest Homes, in Chehalis, Wash., prefers to keep each module in one place, moving its specialized work crews from station to station, much as Levitt does on site.

And General Electric's bid for a big military housing contract is based on a portable factory and 10 basic sub-assemblies put together onsite. GE eschews the role of builder, however, and hopes to market its system to others.

Cutting maintenance. Module builders appear to be acutely conscious of the need for quality work. And buyers of public housing are willing to pay extra for dwellings that offer low maintenance cost. In Stirling Homex's Tudor design, for example, a white exterior of tough Tedlar film laminated to plywood is easy to sponge clean. Interior walls are wallboard laminated with a heavy, textured vinyl. And exterior doors are metal skins filled with dense urethane foam.

There are signs that wood may give way to metal more and more. The wood module of Prebuilt Homes already uses quite a bit of steel—all of it carefully hidden. Chairman Paul Corp does not think an all-steel house would be popular today, but plans to head in that direction as fast as public taste will allow. After 20 years in the auto industry, Corp leans to steel for dimensional control and ease of mechanization. Prebuilt has won a contract to build 800 modular units for Detroit's housing authority.

Switch to steel. National Homes is studying a possible switch to steel studs to improve its fire rating. But the first builder of wood modules to convert entirely will probably be Stirling Homex, whose new Akron plant, due to open this fall, will use all-steel stud construction. The company's Avon plant also will go to steel. Stirling's reason for the switch: it has designed a high-rise system based on steel-frame, stackable modules, and does not want to support two different systems. Stirling will soon expand to about a dozen factories if a planned stock offering is successful.

Other companies are starting out with steel frame construction. In Ft. Lauderdale, Fla., Behring Properties, Inc., has come up with a flexible, three-module design it calls Modiflex. The modules can be arranged to form a variety of one-story houses priced under $17,000, or can be stacked as two-story garden apartments.

U. S. Steel, Jones & Laughlin, and other steel companies have also developed new concepts for steel-framed housing. Interest also is running high over a new system of welded construction called "plastic design." Structural engineers Allison & Meyers of Rockville, Md., who now have a second welded steel high-rise near completion, figure the cost at 10% less than conventional concrete poured in place. Economies in steel high-rise building also are coming from newer, stronger steels and from a "staggered truss" system developed by the Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

Pipes to Pipestone. A number of small companies are starting to use an unusual steel technique devised by Ruble Langston, a former professor. Langston's frame consists of welded steel pipe; wall, floor, and roof panels are made with special glued-on snap fasteners that grip the pipe. Langston's Hanover Modular Homes International, Inc., in Bryan, Tex., has licensed Modular Structures of Pipestone, Minn., to build a group of 10 duplex apartments under a HUD contract.

One of the earliest experimenters in steel frame housing, Rohr Corp., plans to try again with a Breakthrough bid. Rohr produced several modular houses in 1964 and 1965 before trouble with codes and unions ended the project. Says Burt F. Raynes, Rohr president: "Had we stayed with the homes, we'd be the most successful guy in the business today."

Aluminum also has its proponents. Fruehauf Corp. announced earlier this year that it would build an aluminum module. And Modular Mfg. Co. of San Francisco has a panelized prefab house based on aluminum framing. Kaiser Aluminum helped design its metal extrusions, with built-in raceways for wiring.

Synergy. While concrete, wood, and metal impose different design and production disciplines, they come together in many advanced building concepts. The Panel Lock system developed 10 years ago by Lockheed Aircraft Service Co., Ontario, Calif., uses concrete precast in steel frames to form roof and wall panels that are clipped together on site.

Combination systems are especially suited for high-rise housing. Wood modules cannot be stacked more than two or three high. But it is possible to visualize a concrete or steel frame into which prebuilt wood modules could be inserted. Such an installation is being planned for the Twin Cities area, where SkyeRise Terrace, a division of Wick Building Systems, Inc., will build a circular tower to hold 98 mobile-home modules.

Mortar of purpose

All of these systems rely on conventional building materials, but a number of companies have turned to structural concepts based on plastics. One involves a filament-wound module—80% glass, 20% resin—developed by engineers at the University of Michigan and at Aerojet-General Corp., which uses the method for making rocket motor cases.

A proposal to use such modules for low-cost housing on military bases was unsuccessful, but the idea is not dead. Some of the Michigan people formed a small company, Spun-Tech Housing Corp. in Ann Arbor, which hopes, through Breakthrough, to get enough money to build a module. Aerojet-General may be going the same route, but won't disclose any details.

Plastic sandwiches. Another system would use foam plastic in load-bearing walls. Modular Concepts, Inc., of Gardena, Calif., has come up with a panel consisting of rigid polyurethane foam sandwiched between two thin sheets of plywood. The 2-in.-thick panel needs no studs.

Many companies have been working on foam sandwich panels, but generally not for load bearing. Uniroyal Chemical Co., Naugatuck, Conn., for one, hopes to submit a Breakthrough proposal for various types of polymeric wall panels, including rigid urethane foam. And Borg-Warner Corp. has been experimenting with urethane foam between sheets of high-impact thermoplastics.

Plastics are not the ultimate in far-out materials. One house developed by Certain-Teed Products Corp. for an experimental HUD showcase last year at

Faster Ferry

The cross-channel ferry trip from Great Britain to France is being cut to 40 minutes by the British Hovercraft SR. N4. This Mountbatten class air cushion vehicle skims the water at speeds up to 65 knots while carrying 254 passengers and 30 automobiles.

The Buehler Corporation, with its long established reputation for superb craftsmanship and total product integrity, was selected to produce the large spiral bevel gear sets for the power transmission system of the prototype and production models of this amazing craft. The 130 ft., 397,000 lb. vessel uses 4 power transmissions with the precision gearing of each transmitting 3,400 S.H.P.

Solving power transmission problems for high precision, high load applications like this is only one facet of The Buehler Corporation's expanding capabilities. Orientation to design, development, testing and production of complete power transmission systems is making Buehler a preferred source for many leading names in the aerospace, nuclear, marine and commercial products industries.

When you need a full service source with facilities to handle the toughest problems, turn to The Buehler Corporation.

Austin, Tex., was made of a new kind of asbestos cement—used for both wall panels and connecting posts. The same showcase unveiled the Stack-Sack house, made of concrete-filled, water-dipped burlap sacks, reinforced by steel rods. The wall is finished off with a sprayed cement coating. The method, which costs less than $5,000 a unit, has since been used to build an apartment complex in Galveston, Tex., and is now being used in Winston-Salem, N. C.

The builders do, indeed, "have technology coming out of our ears," says James Mitchell, of Arthur D. Little, Inc. "We just haven't found successful ways of assimilating it."

This does not mean that all the technical problems of housing have been solved or that all desirable innovations have been conceived. But most industry and government experts now wrestling with the housing crisis agree that the solutions will not be found in technological breakthroughs.

"We have innovations in plenty," says Boston architect Koch, "but there is no indication that we as a nation are ready to pull in our belts to the extent that is necessary to make the country fit to live in."

Key ingredient. It used to be a common assumption that if the building trades would be reasonable, and if communities would update their building codes, construction men could use new materials and techniques to slash the cost of housing. Only gradually has the federal government awakened to the reality that the industry did not have the financial muscle to retool, cut prices, and thus create a mass market. The mass market would have to be created for it through subsidy, HUD concluded.

Many companies have begun to move on their own, but not on the scale that would produce the kind of savings—estimates run from 10% to 50%—that assembly-line building has produced in other countries. HUD's blend of exhortation, publicity, and money is designed to foster creation of that mass market by winning wide-scale acceptance of industrialized housing.

If Romney can achieve this "breakthrough," the nation may be on its way to forging the commitment needed to solve its explosive housing problems. The rewards could be, at least, a new life for the housing industry and, at best, new hope for millions of Americans.

Ford to Try Housing Field, Buys 30% Interest in Firm

By a WALL STREET JOURNAL Staff Reporter

DETROIT—Ford Motor Co. has dipped a toe into the experimental modular-home construction business by purchasing 30% of the stock of Concept Environment Inc. of Laguna Beach, Calif. Price of the transaction wasn't disclosed.

Under the agreement, Ford has the option of buying up to 80% of the stock over a seven-year period, and has agreed to lend the company up to $1.1 million over the next three years.

Ford termed its venture as a modest "research and investment" project designed to see whether Ford's special talents and capabilities are adaptable to housing. Concept Environment eventually expects to have a capacity of 1,500 factory-built living units a month. Each complete housing module is 12 feet wide and up to 70 feet long, with heating, air conditioning, kitchen appliances and carpeting.

Planning and Debunking

Ten years ago, Sibyl Moholy-Nagy, professor of architectural history at Pratt Institute, widow of renowned Constructivist artist and Bauhaus teacher Laszlo Moholy-Nagy, one of the architectural profession's sharp-witted critics, wrote a delightful book called "Native Genius in Anonymous Architecture." With text and her own photographs, she showed, for the first time in many cases, abstractly painted Canadian barn doors, a cylindrical shingled barn in Pennsylvania, a Vermont mill "like the profile of a distinctive and determined face." Her chosen buildings and building fragments were all expressive, not of tradition but of usage. And her point of view—a humanist one valuing the individual and eschewing the extreme restraints of science, of religion or of "l'art pour l'art" came as a refreshing antidote to the willful artificialities of prevailing "schools" of architectural design.

Mme. Moholy-Nagy now has a new book, "Matrix of Man, An Illustrated History of Urban Environment." Although the earlier book concentrated on rural buildings and the present one is devoted to cities, the earlier attitude remains focused on a different, more urgently important, field. Her hero is still individual man and her villain now is totalitarianism in the planning of his environment. In particular she rejects the tradition of planning that has come down to us from Rome through Christopher Wren's plan for London, L'Enfant's for Washington, and Haussmann's for Paris.

She debunks the canonization of Sixtus V as "patron saint of American city planners who credit him with the first urban renewal miracle." The Sixtus broad routes that sliced through the existing maze of Roman streets were not for the purpose of providing pleasant vistas or more convenient urban life, she contends, but "were designed for a blatantly anti-urban processional ritual of piety and penitence."

There are some parts of "Matrix of Man" that will not be read without disagreement—an intemperate disapproval of the brilliant Thomas Jefferson as architect and planner, an implied but unsubstantiated linking of Chinese and Chinese city plans, such an im-

Her hero is still individual man and her villain now is totalitarianism in the planning of his environment. The Sixtus broad routes that sliced through the existing maze of Roman streets were not for the purpose of providing pleasant vistas or more convenient urban life, she contends, but "were designed for a blatantly anti-urban processional ritual of piety and penitence."

There are some parts of "Matrix of Man" that will not be read without disagreement—an intemperate disapproval of the brilliant Thomas Jefferson as architect and planner, an implied but unsubstantiated linking of Chinese and China city plans, such an intense distaste for modular grid street systems that one (for Indianapolis) is described as "killing any incentive for decent residential or commercial architecture" and another (for Manhattan) as a "planned strait jacket." But there is almost nothing in the book that can be read without interest. Even in the rare cases where Mme. Moholy-Nagy seems to present her argument with more passion than reason, we can be stimulated by her argument.

The sensibility and sensitivity of her book are made even more apparent by comparison with another recently published volume on the same subject: "Ekistics, An Introduction to the Science (sic) of Human Settlement," by the Greek planner Constantinos Doxiadis, is a [illegible] disaster, packed with charts, graphs, and jargon relating man to rooms, dwellings, neighborhoods and cities, but never considering man except as a single, homogenous abstraction. This is all the more regrettable because Doxiadis is an undisputed giant in city planning. He has been widely influential both abroad and in this country, where his services have been used by the cities of Louisville and Cincinnati, the Urban Renewal Program and Detroit Edison Co., among others. One looks, however, largely in vain for some human relevance amid the jargon of his book.

In her own book, Mme. Moholy-Nagy briskly disposes of such pedantry in the can-[illegible] gallery of illustrations, [illegible] diagram illustrating his dictum, "Architecture must be co-ordinated hierarchically at all levels" is dismissed as "an age-old platitude behind a spurious scientific facade."

Such puncturing of inflated notions is one of the delights of "Matrix of Man." Also, the book in itself is very handsome. But most valuable of all is the fact that Mme. Moholy-Nagy never loses sight of individual man. She mourns "the lost art of creating memorable urban landscapes with which the citizen can identify his ambitions and affections. The zealots for social housing and Hudson Street rehabilitations will never understand," she says, "that aesthetic deprivation can be as antisocial as the worst slum," and "If, as the wailing brotherhood of social planners insists, Western cities are dying, it is not from too many automobiles or too few housing projects, but because of too little urbanity and too little opportunity for participation."

Some of the historical references in the author's sweeping survey might be considered a bit esoteric. But the subject of the book—what the nature of our cities should be—is of such importance, and the author's views so welcome, that "Matrix of Man" can be recommended for the general reader as well as for the scholars and people in the planning profession.

gerald vice-president of Lockheed Aircraft Corporation. Mr. Hodgson's selection for the No. 2 job in the department was received by labor with mixed feelings.

P. L. (Roy) Siemiller, president of the International Association of Machinists, the union that bargains with Lockheed, said that Mr. Hodgson is "top flight" and that if a union man couldn't get the job I was "certainly happy that Jim got it."

Other union spokesmen were perhaps a little less happy about Mr. Hodgson, who as late as last Dec. 30 said a passing "amen" to a comment that the National Labor Relations Board "usually behaves like a department of the AFL-CIO and is about as neutral as George Meany." They've noted, too, that Mr. Hodgson expressed "more than a morsel of personal conviction" about excessive union power and that in the same speech he commented, "the unique and powerful position of the American union makes the conduct of its internal affairs an appropriate subject for renewed attention."

Some management wary

Outside the aerospace industry, Mr. Hodgson is best known through his interest in and attendence at academically-oriented conferences on collective bargaining and other issues in industrial relations. He has a sound background and a record of harmonious relations with labor officials. Some management people are more wary of him than laborites seem to be, largely on a basis of some of his conference papers and other writings.

A Democrat, he says he voted for Mr. Nixon in 1964 and 1968.

Arnold R. Weber, newly appointed Assistant Secretary of Labor for Manpower, also is from the University of Chicago Graduate School of Business. Closely associated there with Dean Shultz, he was industrial relations professor and research director. And with Mr. Shultz and Mr. Hodgson, he is nationally known on the labor issues conference circuit.

Mr. Weber considers one major goal of the Nixon Labor Department to be to help the unemployed and underemployed — with the emphasis on the hard-core jobless and ghetto residents — get the basic education, training, and jobs they need. At the same time, he thinks the department must help to promote national economic growth and stability, and he believes both objectives can be achieved.

As an assistant, he has appointed Dr. Joseph A. Pichler, who studied under Mr. Schultz and Mr. Weber in Chicago, to head a team to analyze manpower programs and their relationship to labor-management relations. Dr. Pichler is an associate professor of industrial relations at the University of Kansas.

Dr. Godfrey H. Moore of New York will be the Labor Department's new commissioner of the Bureau of Labor Statistics. Dr. Moore has been a vice-president of the National Bureau of Economic Research, a nonprofit organization.

Mrs. Elizabeth Duncan Koontz, the first black president of the National Education Association, is the new head of the Women's Bureau in the Labor Department. Mrs. Koontz, known nationally in NEA as "Libby," is the daughter of a president of Atkinson College. After graduating from Livingstone College in Salisbury, N.C., she did graduate work at the University of Atlanta, Columbia University, and Indiana University and then began teaching in North Carolina.

Urban Problem

City, Suburb Gap Grows

By JULIAN H. LEVI
Professor of Urban Studies, University of Chicago

In Chicago Today

THE MINNEAPOLIS STAR
Tues., Jan. 14, 1969

The disparities between city and suburb go far beyond the race and income of their population. Every available indicator of economic activity dramatizes the deteriorating competitive position of the central city.

Manufacturing volume in central cities has been increasing at less than half the other manufacturing volume nationwide. The number of retail establishments has been decreasing in the central cities but increasing elsewhere in the nation. The total number of jobs in central cities has decreased by over 10 per cent since 1950 while total city population has increased in this time by 21 per cent. In 1960 the per capita income in suburbs was over 10 per cent higher than it was in central cities. This gap appears to be widening.

In 1962 local per capita welfare expenditures in central cities were almost twice what they were in suburbs. This disparity is increasing at an even faster rate than the difference in total population. It is become painfully clear that jobs, investments and services are bypassing the central cities at a rate which seriously constrains the city's capacity for meeting problems which grow in magnitude and nastiness.

Moreover, if present trends continue, by 1983 the aggregate population of the central cities in this nation will be nearly 40 per cent Negro and 40 per cent poor. By 1983 at least 20 of our major central cities, including, among others, Chicago, Philadelphia, Cleveland, Detroit and Baltimore, will be predominantly Negro. Of that population, 45 per cent will have incomes of less than $3,000 a year. These emergent Negro majorities will be inheriting the deficit areas of the American economy—business investments declining, per capita income, public revenues, conditions in housing, opportunities for employment.

What we are building in this country is the type of confrontation that neither the political nor the social system can permit. What in effect we have done is to put a deprived population into a backwater and forget about them. Job opportunities develop outside of the city. At this moment there are hundreds of people in Woodlawn (a predominately black section of Chicago) who seek employment. There are tens and more of manufacturers outside the city looking for employes, but the two don't match.

I do not regard it is a tragedy or as a cause for serious comment that the effect of this migration and change will result in the election of Negro mayors and Negro city councillors. I regard it as an extraordinarily unfortunate and catastrophic fact that this will occur at a time when the cities they then must administer will be bankrupt, defeated and desperate.

But what do you think is going to happen to the major business investments in these cities? At this point, some people are going to begin to talk about metropolitan government—not in terms of efficiency but in terms of intending to disenfranchise the central city majorities by enlarging the size of the voting unit to where they will be out-voted.

outfits. The study said cooperation among contractors in holding wages in line has decreased markedly in recent years.

The study noted, but did not advocate, several proposals for change. One was for national procedures to resolve local labor disputes in construction. Another was for all contractors in a region to band together and bargain with unions collectively.

A third would stress apprentice training and developing skills in minority groups. The study noted, however, that Negroes, Puerto Ricans, and Mexican-Americans are often barred from learning construction trades.

A fourth would require all contractors in an area to shut down if one is struck. This proposal would need legislation, the study said.

A fifth would establish a board of labor, management, and public representatives to recommend settlements on labor disputes before a strike or lockout.

CENTRAL CITY TEACHER-COMMUNITY PROJECT
USOE Project Number 975

600 W. Kilbourn Avenue, Milwaukee, Wisconsin 53203
(414) 228-4922

PROJECT DESCRIPTION

PURPOSE: The project objectives are:

1. To upgrade the academic preparation, community sensitivity, and communications skills of 80 central city school teachers and administrators now assigned to participating schools or who will be assigned to those schools in September 1967.
2. To upgrade the desire and the ability of children of 800 families with children of participating schools to reap maximum benefits from the educational programs of the school, and other opportunities in the community.
3. To stimulate increased interest of the parents of children attending participating schools in opportunities offered by the school and other agencies for their children and also for themselves. This includes developing understanding of ways and means of parent access to school staff through parent-teacher conferences and other communications channels.
4. To design, test, and demonstrate methodology for implementation of the above objectives by utilizing specialized resources of the University of Wisconsin - Milwaukee, the Milwaukee Public Schools, the neighboring community, and other relevant resources.

PROGRAM: Each project participant will, in the 8 week summer phase of the program, June 19 through August 11, 1967 be expected to:

1. Participate in the academic phase of the program involving approximately 8 classroom hours per week. Those successfully completing this, and all other phases of the program will receive 6 UWM graduate credits. These credits will tentatively be listed as: "Teaching of the Disadvantaged" - 3 credits and "Community Resources Workshop" - 3 credits.
2. Participate in the field work phase of the program for a minimum of 20 hours per week. In cooperation with a community representative, work closely with a number of selected students (and their families) from the participant's school.
3. Participate in a 3 hour weekly seminar interrelating the academic and field work phases of the program.

STIPEND: Each participant in the program will receive a tuition scholarship for the six graduate UWM credits and a stipend equal to twice the participant's net pay for April 1967. One-half of the stipend will be paid on or about July 15, 1967 and one-half will be paid on or about August 13, 1967. The only cost to the participants will be a sum of about $20.00 for texts and curriculum materials plus costs and expenses incurred in the field work with students and families.

CONDITIONS: Each applicant for this project must agree to participate in all phases of the program outlined above and to:

1. Accept no other renumerative employment during the 8 week summer phase of the project: June 19 through August 11, 1967.
2. Commit themselves full-time to the project.
3. Remain at the school to which presently assigned for the 1967-68 and 1968-69 school years unless transferred by their administrative superiors. Note- This item does not apply to the 15 Robert Fulton teachers presently participating in the 1966-67 phase of the program since they made this commitment prior to their first year in the program.
4. To continue, during the academic year, to make systematic contact with the students and families assigned for the summer phase.
5. To participate themselves, and to involve non-participant faculty as much as possible, in a monthly seminar during the school year to evaluate the project itself and the academic year follow-up.
6. Assist the school principal in developing the community sensitivity of the school faculty; particularly with teachers newly assigned to the school.
7. Participate in a preliminary orientation and research session to be held on non-school time prior to June 19.

STAFF: The project will be directed by an operating committee consisting of:

Mr. Paul Baumann, Principal, Robert Fulton Junior High School and Project Co-Coordinator
Mr. Thomas Cheeks, Milwaukee Public Schools
Mr. Michael Kies, Cooperative Educational Service Agency Number 19
(Alternate: Miss Helen Olsen, CESA Number 19)
Mr. Reuben Harpole, University of Wisconsin-Milwaukee Extension
Dr. Belden Paulson, University of Wisconsin-Milwaukee and University of Wisconsin - Milwaukee Extension

ANNOUNCING A NEW INFORMATION SERVICE ON MINORITY EMPLOYMENT ..... URBAN EMPLOYMENT

Dear Sir:

Those of us who are concerned with minority employment have urgently needed an information service -- one that is reliable, factual, national in scope (Detroit, Los Angeles, Atlanta and across the country -- not just in Washington) and published frequently so that information is up-to-date. There is such a publication -- Urban Employment, a twice-monthly newsletter on minority employment, training, and upgrading. It regularly reports on:

- Needs, activities and demands of minority groups.
- Black worker groups and union activities and their impact on business activity.
- Status and progress of national organizations and companies in their campaigns to employ minorities.
- Shifting government requirements.
- Sources of funds, technical assistance and other resources being made available.
- Case studies of model programs for hiring and training minority recruits.

Twice a month, Urban Employment covers news developments, trends, conferences, documents, books and articles in the field -- information gathered from 1,000 publications, newspapers, government, active groups and individuals all over the country. You may judge by the enclosed complimentary issue that no other service provides this broad spectrum of information on a current and regular basis.

Urban Employment costs $40 a year. Please fill out the enclosed form. We will start your subscription immediately and bill you later. If you are not completely satisfied, with Urban Employment, notify us within 30 days and we will cancel your billing.

HEW Moves To Void Philadelphia Contract

The Department of Health, Education and Welfare has taken the first step towards voiding a contract on grounds that the contractor has failed to live up to provisions of the Philadelphia Plan. Edgely Air Products of Levittown, Pennsylvania, was told August 19 that it had ten days to request an administrative hearing on the Department's action.

The primary contract under dispute (for sheet-metal work on a medical laboratory building at the University of Pennsylvania) provided that eight percent of the man-hours for sheet metal workers would be performed by minority group workers. HEW says that no minority workers were hired. The company however, claims that the contract was for less than the $500,000 limit beneath which the Philadelphia Plan does not apply. HEW says the contract was originally estimated at $800,000, while the contractor said it was $499,800. Five other Philadelphia contractors received notice on July 1 that similar action would begin against them if they did not give evidence of compliance.

Suit Filed Vs. UFWOC

The National Right to Work Committee filed a suit in Tulare County, California Superior Court against the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee, seeking an injunction against unionization without election. The suit asks that all dues be put in escrow by the UFWOC until the case is settled. Under the terms of the recent contracts signed between the UFWOC and grape growers, all workers must join the union within seven days of employment. The union hiring halls assign jobs on the basis of union seniority.

Jonathan Gibson, attorney for the National Right to Work Committee Defense Foundation,said that the suit was filed because there was no election among the grape workers when the UFWOC and the grape growers signed contracts. According to S.D. Cadwallader, president of the Right to Work Committee, "Thousands of California grape workers are now going to be told, you join the Cesar Chavez union or you don't work."

Berry Farmer Commits Breach of Contract

Migrant workers have for the first time successfully sued an employer for breach of contract. A berry farmer, Ronald Tankersley, of Washington County, Oregon had promised, via radio broadcast, that his farm labor camp satisfied state health and labor department requirements and that it produced an average of eight tons of berries per acre, although it had never done so. Many of the workers recruited by the broadcasts were not hired by Tankersley or were hired for brief periods. United States District Court Judge Alfred T. Goodwin ruled that there was breach of contract, but he said that plaintiffs were not entitled to punitive damages because there was no proof offered that the recruiting promises were made in bad faith or that Tankersley intended to harm anyone by the advertising. Each of the 32 workers joining in the suit (residents of New Mexico and Texas) will have to individually prove claims for damages as a result of the breach of contract. Each person will have to show by specific reference to days and hours worked whether he was ready, able and willing to work and that he was damaged by the failure to provide work.

Judge Goodwin said that the grower, when he induced needy persons to travel long distances, to Oregon, had made an implied covenant not to hire more workers than can earn a reasonable wage by doing the available work. Some of the evidence brought out in the trial suggests areas for new social legislation, according to Judge Goodwin. He told growers and legislators that, "The testimony gives ample warning to employers that the expectations of farm laborers are keeping pace with those of their urban neighbors."

Committee On Spanish-Speaking Meets With Agnew

The Cabinet Committee on Opportunity for the Spanish-Speaking was joined last month in its regular meeting by Vice-President, Spiro Agnew. The group discussed with the Vice-President the fact that most current job programs for minorities fail the Spanish-speaking individual because they are not geared to their needs. Martin G. Castillo, chairman of the committee, urged that more Spanish-speaking people be brought into the federal government at a policy-making level. He suggested that federal recruiters look to Spanish-speaking neighborhoods in the future.

Anti-poverty leaders from Mexican-American communities across the country took similar concerns with them when they met with Office of Economic Opportunity officials in Washington recently. They asked for greater, broader emphasis on anti-poverty programs for Spanish-speaking people to remedy inequities in funding which have created struggles between blacks and themselves for anti-poverty projects. Frank Carlucci, OEO Operations Director, accepted the complaints as legitimate, saying that the emphasis has been on blacks. But, he added that OEO tries to avoid aiming programs at specific ethnic groups. A petition given to OEO by the community leaders asks for Chicano community action programs, a Mexican-American Community Corporation to include a research and development firm and inclusion of Mexican-Americans in policy-making positions in OEO's regional offices.

ACLU Charges ABC News With Sex Bias

The New York City Commission on Human Rights is investigating a charge made by the American Civil Liberties Union that the American Broadcasting Company's New York News bureau practices "unlawful discrimination against women in employment." Of ABC News' 250 New York employees, about 50 are women and most of them hold low level jobs; 33 are secretaries and seven are researchers. Although women "are obviously qualified to compete with men for the more senior posts, as a matter of policy (ABC News), with rare expection, employs only men for those senior posts and neither encourages nor takes seriously applications for those jobs submitted by women," according to the ACLU.

There is concern that the women represented by the ACLU are jeopardizing their jobs by participating in the charge. The ACLU says that although many more women than they represent have been discriminated against, they remain silent for fear of losing their jobs or deopardizing what slim chances for advancement exist..

In ABC News' Washington, D.C. bureau, eleven of 36 news personnel are women, including one researcher, six secretaries, one film editor, one graphic artist, and one producer. The bureau in Washington also employs over 104 engineers and technicians, none of whom are females.

Court Rules Against Illinois Protective Law

A federal district court in Springfield, Illinois, has ruled that the Illinois Maximum Hours Act conflicts with the 1964 Civil Rights Act because it forbids employing women for more than eight hours a day. The decision upheold positions taken by the Illinois Bell Telephone Company and Caterpillar Tractor Company in two separate suits filed last March. Illinois Bell charged that the law meant only men could receive extra pay available from overtime work and that it prevented women from being promoted or assigned jobs which regularly require long working hours. Illinois Bell is the largest private employer of women in Illinois.

New Outreach Programs Will Prepare Apprentices

In addition to the collection of hiring plans similar to the Philadelphia Plan, which have been developed across the country with federal subsidies for training, the Department of Labor supports a number of other training efforts designed to get minorities into craft union apprenticeship and journeymen slots. The primary program in this area is Apprenticeship Outreach which prepares young men to be apprentices. It is often reinforced by parallel programs which prepare older men with construction experience so they can be placed as journeymen.

An Outreach contract is given to one of a number of public or private organizations which then work with local unions and contractors. Minority group trainees are then recruited through State Employment Service offices, Apprenticeship Information Centers, and various social service centers. Outreach contractors range from the Workers' Defense League in New York City to the United Auto Workers in Detroit. A number of new Outreach programs have been announced this summer. There are now 70 in operation.

On May 6, the Labor Department made public the awarding of $575,421 to the International Union of United Automobile, Aerospace and Agricultural Implement Workers of America (UAW) to prepare 600 minority youth for apprenticeship in metal-working trades in 22 cities in seven states over a period of two years.

An Outreach contract has been awarded to the Christ Child Settlement of Washington, D.C. to recruit, prepare and place 30 minority youths in bricklayer apprenticeship programs. The five month contract involves $54,529 in federal funds. Christ Child's program is partially residential. Trainees will stay at the Settlement House's summer camp Mondays through Fridays during their training. Christ Child has already placed 27 minority youth as carpenters' apprentices as the result of a previous Outreach program. A second grant will support preparing 20 more young men to be carpenters' apprentices.

The Building Industry Minorities Employment Program of Central New York, Inc., received an 18 month, $15,658 contract to upgrade the skills of 100 black men with construction experience to enable them to achieve full journeyman status and union recognition. Under the contract, tradesman specialists will be employed to recruit minority applicants who are over the normal apprenticeable age, but who possess backgrounds or aptitudes in mechanical skills, physical ability to perfrom the work and strong motivation to do construction work.

New Apprenticeship Outreach programs are beginning in Spokane, Washington; Indianapolis, Indiana; Harrisburg, Pennsylvania; and Norfolk, Virginia. The Indianapolis Plan for Equal Employment, Inc., will prepare 80 young men for apprenticeship tests over 18 months. It will also enable 420 men with previous experience or skills to be upgraded to the journeyman level. Together the Indianapolis projects are receiving $449,982 in federal funds. The Harrisburg and Norfolk projects will each give pre-apprenticeship preparation for 30 minority youth at a cost of $481,000 in Harrisburg and $44,850 in Norfolk.

The Northeastern Washington-Northern Idaho Building and Construction Trades Council will prepare 30 minority youth for the Building trades in 12 months, with $52,523 in federal funds.

A number of national unions are funded by the federal government to recruit and train minorities for apprenticeship or journeyman positions. The National Administration Committee of the AFL-CIO's International Association of Bridge, Structural and Ornamental Iron Workers joined with three contractors' associations to sponsor a program that will provide $1.2 million of training for 600 men over an 18 month period. The program will train men over 31 years of age in one of three categories as qualified mechanics who can perform at a journeyman's skill level; as advance trainees with some amount of experience; or as unexperienced trainees who do not meet apprenticeship requirements. Each worker in an advanced training program will receive a minimum of 288 hours of supplemental instruction beyond training at the job site. Journeymen will give on-the-job instruction. The National Committee is responsible for monitoring the agreement. Wage rates will be at least 50 percent of local journeyman wages and will depend on a man's level of experience. Supplementary recruiting sources, besides the local state employment services, will include the National Urban League, the Worker's Defense League, the Cabinet Committee on Opportunity for the Spanish Speaking and the Bureau of Indian Affairs. An average of $2400 will be spent on each man for orientation, on-the-job training and classroom training, both related and supplemental.

In 1965 Congress amended the Manpower Development and Training Act to authorize occupational training of 10,000 prison inmates. Among other services, this amendment provides for paying inmates an incentive allowance for taking part in training. They receive up to $20 a week for training, part of which is banked for until they are released. As a result of this provision, federal funds have been put to use by a number of building and construction trades training programs in federal prisons. Experimental projects are underway in New York City and Washington, D.C., through which "younger and non-hardened offenders" are turned over to a training and job opportunity program before arraignment. Those who are not responsive to program efforts after 90 days are returned to normal court procedures.

There are apprenticeship programs in 15 federal prisons, all promoted by the Labor Department. A classic case of prison job training and support services is the program at the Draper Correctional Center in Elmore, Alabama, where after five years, a comprehensive program has developed. It gives counseling, job training, support services (including obtaining employment bonds, getting money for tools, relocating families), education, job development and placement, and follow-up. Bonding assistance given at Draper shows that in three years only 27 of 1738 bonded prisoners defaulted. The bonding contractor has reduced its premium by 60 percent as a result.

A Seattle program uses convicted felons on parole as assistant parole officers. They work three days a week and are enrolled in local colleges in programs leading to a bachelors degree. The Labor Department pays all training costs, all of the assistants' first year salaries and a portion of their second year salaries.

Labor Readies New Apprentice-Ship Guidelines

The Labor Department is proposing new regulations for promoting equal employment opportunity in apprenticeship programs which would require sponsors to formulate "affirmative action" plans for hiring minorities in programs registered with the Labor Department or with state agencies. They also will have detailed and stricter guidelines for the selection of apprentices. All qualifications have "to be validated by accepted standards of statistical analysis" or approved by the Labor Department. Qualified candidates would enter " a pool of eligibles" and be picked randomly for the apprenticeships, except where the Department approves the use of an alternate selection scheme. Such selection procedures, even if they have been used in the past, either through a contract or established promotion policies, must be approved by the Department of Labor as being non-discriminatory. Apprenticeship program sponsors would have nine months to develop affirmative action plans after the Department finalizes the guidelines.

These guidelines would apply to programs registered with the Labor Department or state apprenticeship councils. Registration allows employers to pay apprentices lower wages on federal projects. Like the Philadelphia Plan, the new regulations will require specific goals and timetables to be set for recruiting minorities in areas where minority representation in the craft does not approximate their proportion in the area's labor force and population.

Blacks in USW Act To Get More Voice

At the same time that a federal judge has ruled that unions cannot constitutionally maintain locals separated by race, black members of the United Steel Workers Union (USW) in Buffalo,New York are moving to establish a separate black union for better representation of black workers. In Pittsburgh,Baltimore and Cleveland, black steelworkers are organizing to protest their lack of representation in union offices and grievance procedures.

Stanley D. Murphy, a black steelworker was chairman of the Buffalo meeting. He ran for president of local No. 2603 last year and lost by three votes. 2603 with 6000 steelworkers is the biggest of the five locals at Bethlehem Steel's Lackawanna, New York Plant. Altogether it is estimated that there are 5000 black production workers in Bethlehem's five locals. Murphy announced formation of a separatist black organization that would obtain proper representation for black union members while working within the general union framework. Murphy announced that blacks would construct their own union building and that the group would halt the check-off of union dues. Stopping the check-off, he said, "could prove a lever to make sure that we get proper representation." Representatives at the conference voiced the feeling that both the company and the union leadership subtly pushed a racist policy and that continuation of this could eventually lead to further separatist moves by black union members. The value of the parent union in the areas of wage and job classification agreements was acknowledged, however.

The federal court ruling rose out of a case in which there were two parallel unions of longshoremen, one black and one white, on the docks in Baltimore. Federal judge Alexander Harvey II ruled that no union has a constitutional right to maintain separate locals for black and white workers. Unions, he said, are established for economic advancement, not to further ideas and beliefs. They therefore cannot claim racial separation covered by constitutional guarantees of freedom of association. A second ruling is pending on a similar situation in Texas.

Also in Baltimore, the Ad Hoc Committee of Black Steelworkers has worked out the final wording of resolutions to be presented at the 1970 USW convention, appointment of a convention committee, plans for a fund-raising program, a membership drive and expansion of the Ad Hoc Committee. Some black members of the United Steelworkers' Civil Rights Committee are also on the Ad Hoc Committee.

Fewer Teen-Agers Enter Labor Market

Labor Department statistics and studies released this summer show that important changes have occurred in the summer youth labor force this year. In three areas — overall employment levels, the employment of teenagers for the summer, and the employment rates in minority neighborhoods — unemployment has shown greater gains than employment, despite a general growth in the size of the youth labor force (16-21 years of age).

The Labor Department's most recent report on summer youth employment shows that the rate has hit a nine year high, that unemployment in this age group is highest among black males, more youth stayed out of the labor force this year than last (although the youth labor force itself increased), and the only sector of the economy to show an increase in jobs for youth was the service sector, particularly the retail trades.

Even though the summer is almost over, large numbers of teen-agers are still jobless; many have not yet abandoned the search for a job. The overall unemployment rate for young people in the 16-21 age group is 16 percent. In mid-August, according to the Labor Department, the total number of 16-21 year olds employed was 11.2 million, down 210,000 from 1969. But, the youth labor force was larger in '70 than '69; it increased by over 200,000. The number of unemployed young people reached 2.1 million, an increase of 410,000 over last summer. This was the first year-to-year drop in summer employment of young people in the last nine years.

Service sector jobs accounted for a larger proportion of employment among 16-21 year-olds this year than last. Only 2.5 million young people were employed by goods-producing industries, a drop of 470,000 over last year. Service-producing industries employed 6.1 million young people, an increase of 340,000 over last year. All of the increased service-producing employment of youth came from the retail trades. Employment of youth in government declined by 50,000 this summer, bringing the overall level to 1.2 million. 1970 is the second consecutive year in which government summer youth employment dropped; between 1964 and 1968 the proportion of youths employed by the government rose steadily from 6.6 percent to 11.8 percent.

The reduced availability of jobs fell disproportionately upon black youths. Unemployment of black youths reached 30.2 percent, an increase over last year's 24.6 percent. The unemployment rate for white youths also rose to 13.6 percent over last year's 11.2 percent. Smaller cities absorbed most of the increase in unemployment. Unemployment rates in urban poverty neighborhoods of the nation's largest cities remained virtually unchanged this year. It is felt that the absence of change reflected the fact that many poverty area residents are employed in low-skill service-related jobs which have increased in employees this summer. It is significant that riots and civil disturbances in low-income areas have concentrated in the smaller cities this summer.

There was also an increase in the number of young people who did not bother to enter the work force this summer, in addition to the increase in those who did. The labor force participation rate this summer was 64.8 percent (.7 percent higher than last year) and some 340,000 youths did not enter the labor market this summer.

Overall, the July unemployment rate reached 5 percent. The federal government added six more cities to its list of substantial unemployment of six percent or more. There are now 24 cities on this list, the largest number in five years. The new additions are New Britain, Connecticut; South Bend Indiana; Portland,Oregon; Detroit; Spokane,Washington; New Orleans and the Springfield-Chicopee-Holyoke area of Massachusetts. Among the large cities with over six percent unemployment are: Oakland, Newark,Cleveland, Seattle,Tacoma, Witchita and Muskegon. Two cities in Puerto Rico, Ponce and Mayaguez, have a 12 percent unemployment rate.

A Labor Department study released August 6 shows that the black unemployment rate in the Watts area of Los Angeles increased 61 percent between the 1965 riot and the end of 1969. Overall, the most recent Watts unemployment rate reached 16.2 percent as compared with 4.3 percent for the whole Los Angeles area. Labor experts say that the increase is partially explained by people finding jobs and then moving out of Watts, and also by a large increase in the female population. Joblessness among black women almost doubled in the 1965-69 period.

Pre-Apprenticeship Training Shows 33-36% Return

An analysis of the pre-apprenticeship training component of project BUILD, in Washington, D.C. shows that the rate of return on the economic investment in pre-apprenticeship training ranged from 33 to 36 percent. For a program completer the pay-back period in which the economic costs to the economy are paid for by his productivity ranges from 2.77 to 3.0 years. The government regains its investment in training from a program completer in 12 to 13 years.

Project Build is a training program with three components: pre-apprenticeship training for disadvantaged city youth; craftsman skill refinement training for currently employed, but inadequately trained older workers in the construction industry; and recruiting, support services and job-related training for inner-city youth employed by the Winston A. Burnett Construction Company. BUILD is sponsored by the Greater Washington Central Labor Council AFL-CIO, and the Washington Building and Construction Trades Council. Pre-apprenticeship training is for young men, aged 17½ to 24, particularly those who are high school drop-outs from low income families living in urban renewal and Model Cities areas. The program lasts 24 weeks and pays $1.60 an hour for the first four weeks. This rate may be raised to $1.70, $1.85 or $2.00 an hour depending on a trainee's performance. Curriculum consists of job orientation, counseling, remediation in computation and communication skills, familiarization with the construction crafts and work experience.

This training leads to entry into a union apprenticeship program in the building and construction trades. BUILD involves union craftsmen and members of the trades Joint Apprenticeship Committees in curriculum planning, training, evaluation of trainees and placement of trainees in apprenticeship programs. BUILD's Craftsmen Skill Refinement Program is available to men of all ages, and qualifies them as journeymen, eligible for union membership. The study was made by Markley Roberts as part of a doctoral degree in economics at the American University,Washington,D.C.

Study Provides Guidelines for Consortia, Subcontractors

Coalition-JOBS is a combination of the National Alliance of Businessmen and the Urban Coalition in New York City. Since its primary function is to help businesses write, plan and implement Manpower Administration Development and Training contracts for the hiring and upgrading of hardcore unemployed and underemployed workers, it undertook a study of the MA-3 and -4 contracts in New York City in November of 1969. The study, The MA Contract in New York, was designed to evaluate progress made in training hardcore and to find new ways in which employers, Labor Department and Coalition-JOBS could improve the training and upgrading processes.

The study covers 92 companies participating in contracts, 40 of which had contracts of their own, and 52 of which were participants in consortia. Sixty-six of these companies trained for white collar jobs and 26 for blue collar jobs. Most of the companies surveyed (39%) employed 10,000 or more employees. The total number of trainees hired under MA-3 and -4 contracts was 7,369 and at the time of the survey, 4,008 of these hires were still on board.

The study's primary conclusion is that the contract program seems to be achieving its major goals. The MA program appears to be hiring genuinely disadvantaged persons and hiring criteria have been successfully adjusted in favor of less well-educated, less-skilled and less-experienced applicants. Jobs provided were genuinely new opportunities. Trainees' wages are comparable to those of regular entry-level employees in their industries. Two-thirds of hiring companies report retention as good as or better than for regular employees. Program directors agree that special counseling of trainees and sensitivity training for supervisors are effective in reducing employee turnover.

A number of problem areas common to those surveyed emerged from the study. While consortia are important mechanisms for involving medium-sized and smaller companies in training, they have been difficult to operate successfully, principally because participating companies lacked commitment to the goals of JOBS and to the specific consortium. To remedy this, the study suggests that participating companies be involved in planning and designing stages of the program. There must be communication between the consortium operations staff and a Board of Directors from participating companies. A set of consortium guidelines emphasizes the need for communication among the members, and the need for clear understanding among all members, of the legal, financial and program responsibilities of the Labor Department, and the subcontractor to each other. Certain program designs have been found to influence retention rates and their use is strongly recommended. They include: designing orientation to enhance employee-company orientation by having trainees interviewed and hired by the company; conducting orientation at the company site; designing the training center to resemble the company environment; and (taking into consideration the availability of transportation, seasonal and economic fluctations in the economy) developing a sound financial projection for the duration of the whole contract.

Use of subcontractors for support services apparently presented another area of difficulty for companies surveyed. To avoid disappointments and problems with these contractors, Coalition-JOBS advises that a company "choose a subcontractor as you would choose an insurance company or a jobber. Get a bid." The study includes a sample letter to "Subcontractor, Inc," inviting prospective subcontractors to bid. Once a list of potential subcontractors is formed, it is suggested that their capability and performance records be carefully investigated by interviews with past clients and administrative and program staff. A checklist of 16 important questions is offered for this stage. Planing a training program should begin only after the subcontractor is chosen. Coalition-JOBS feels that large companies should develop their own training capacity within their own staff and organizations. Not all responsibility lies with the subcontractor.

Coalition-JOBS and the Labor Department, the study suggests, should expect to develop more technical assistance for the MA contract companies and they should concentrate their efforts on developing contracts for high wage level jobs. A few of the companies surveyed were unable to provide high enough wages at the end of training to ensure retention and an improvement in trainees' economic situation. Coalition-JOBS underlines the fact that unless this is done, the objectives of the JOBS program will not be met.

To ensure that recruiting procedures are not responsible for high attrition rates, as some companies seem to think, the study recommends that formal seminars and visits be established for counsellors at agencies such as the New York State Employment Service to familiarize them with the jobs and industrial setting in which trainees will be placed. Special assistance must be given to Spanish-speaking trainees and the white-collar criteria of language ability must be evaluated to facilitate placing more Spanish-speaking personnel. An increase in the unemployment rate, it is felt, tends to decrease the effectiveness of the JOBS training. Consequently, Coalition-JOBS feels that the National Alliance of Businessmen should exercise its influence in favor of measures that will soften the impact of business slowdowns on recently hired MA contract trainees.

Results of the survey give an indication of the practices followed by most employers. While most employers changed their hiring criteria, few of them eliminated or reduced their reliance on physical examinations, reflecting a desire to screen out drug users. Nearly half of the white collar employers, but almost none of the blue collar employers, consider police records as a factor in hiring decisions. Most white collar employers who retained this criteria claim they examine each case individually rather than applying a blanket rule.

Over 90 percent of the trainees were paid less than $2.20 an hour at the beginning of training. By the end of training, one in five had potential earnings of $2.60 an hour or more, two in five got $2.20 to $2.59 an hour and 27 percent were earning about $2.20 an hour. One in seven trainees held jobs that paid less than $2.00 an hour, even after training. "In general, "the study notes the lower the post-training wage level, the higher the proportion of Spanish-speaking and women trainees. . .in the programs with average post-training wages of $2.40 an hour or more, only 22% of the jobs were held by Spanish-speaking trainess and 41 percent by women."

Urban Poor Seen in Deep Poverty

By KEN HARTNETT

WASHINGTON (AP) — Almost half the nation's urban poor belong to families locked so deeply into poverty they can't escape unaided "at any time in the future," a new study says.

Economist Anthony Downs reported also that two of every five members of the urban poor population are children under 18, almost 20 per cent of the families are elderly, almost 5 per cent are headed by disabled males and almost 24 per cent are headed by females under 65.

Downs, a member of the President's National Commission on Urban Problems, said nearly one of four urban poor families is headed by a regularly employed man under 65 "whose poverty results from low earning rather than unemployment, disability or old age."

Only about one in every eight poor urban families is headed by non-disabled men under 65 who are either unemployed or underemployed.

"Since over 40 per cent of all poor persons in metropolitan areas cannot be expected to become economically self-sustaining," Downs wrote, "significantly improved and enlarged programs of public assistance, combined with expanded child-care facilities for women with dependent children, are probably the only way to remove them from poverty."

Using 1968 data, Downs puts the urban poor population under 18 at 5.4 million, 12 per cent of all children living in metropolitan areas and 42.2 per cent of all the metropolitan poor.

Fifty-four per cent of the children were white and 46 per cent none-white. Poor children were twice as likely to be living in the central cities than in the suburbs.

While the number of urban poor children declined from 6.3 million to 5.4 million between 1959 and 1968, Downs said, the number of poor children living in families headed by females rose by 38 per cent among whites and 73 per cent among non-whites.

Dear Mr. Lawson:

Enclosed are several articles from our quarterly publication, New South, and our monthly tabloid, South Today.

We are undoubtedly too late for your March 6 dateline but perhaps these may be included in a later issue of Exchange.

We would be pleased to have our materials shared through Exchange but would you let me know if these are the kinds of materials which you would like to see.

Mrs Andy Harvey

Dear Fellow Member:

Once again the Urban Writers' Society has passed through a staff transition. The transition, combined with a manpower shortage, resulted in the delay in getting the Urban Writers' Exchange to you.

The material before you dates back to our last issue. We have added a new section, drawn from the Coalition's "Weekly Monitor", which summarizes articles from January 1 which we were not able to include. This summary will become a regular feature of Exchange.

To regularize our operations a bit more, we have decided to compile Exchange on a bimonthly basis. The following dates are due dates for material through the end of the year. We would appreciate it if you would jot them down on your calendar and send us whatever material you have.

DECEMBER 10

In addition to Exchange, we will be experimenting with a mailing called "Resource" which will present material centered around a given issue of interest to urban writers. The time, expense, and interest generated by such a venture will determine its continuance. Hopefully it will broaden the scope of the Urban Writers' Exchange. We would appreciate any comments you have regarding subjects of interest to you.

Included with Exchange is an issue of Public Management entitled, "Communicating with the Communicators", and The National Urban Coalition's publications list. In addition to those publications included on the list, the following are available on request:

Order from Urban Coalition

Falling Down on the Job: The United States Employment Service and the Disadvantaged, an examination of the history of the Department of Labor's manpower services for minorities with special emphasis on the Work Incentive Program, a forerunner to the work requirement included in the new Family Assistance Plan.

The Cost of Security: National Defense and Military Assistance Requirements for the 70's, an in depth examination of our defense spending. A back-up study to the Coalition's publication, Counterbudget, an alternative federal budget for 1971-76.

COMMENT

"Revenue sharing," "welfare reform," "full employment budget" and "national health insurance" are major concepts or phrases of which we shall hear a great deal after the 92nd Congress convenes on January 21. The first will have a decided effect on all our deliberations.

REVENUE SHARING For decades, the Congress has shared with or returned Federal revenues to the States and local communities to help meet what were presumed to be common needs. Sometimes on the recommendation of the Federal executive branch and sometimes on its own, the Congress decided which of those needs were of national importance and how best they might be met. Such categorical programs as Hill-Burton, aid for schools in Federally-impacted areas and Head Start, each with its uniformity of standards and of administration, were the result.

Revenue sharing as proposed by the Nixon Administration is a radically different concept. It envisions the return to States and local governmental units of sizable amounts of Federal revenues with no strings attached. The Congress and the Administration might assume that most such funds would be used for education or health needs or jobs or services. But the actual determination of priorities would be made by each local unit of government and, even when announced objectives might seem identical, methods of attainment would be locally determined without any master plans emanating from Washington.

Currently, there is an extremely powerful and a well-coordinated lobbying effort being made to persuade the Congress to adopt this concept. Its proponents—employees and associations of counties, of municipalities and of the States—talk not in terms of the initial $500 million and then the $1.5 billion mentioned by the Administration last year as starters but in terms of $10 to $20 billion in fiscal year 1972 (the year beginning July 1, 1971).

The Pros and Cons

Major arguments in favor of the proposal are three: (1) the fiscal emergency confronting many local units of government; (2) the broader tax base and far more effective collection mechanism available to the Federal government, and (3) the philosophical contention that the local unit of government is far better able to determine its priorities of needs and should have the decisive voice in how to spend whatever Federal funds are its due.

last version it presented to the Senate Finance Committee? Or the version represented by the Ribicoff-Bennett (Senators Abraham Ribicoff, D-Conn., and Wallace Bennett, R-Utah) amendments which it assured liberal groups it could support and around which a certain organizational consensus seemed to have been reached in the closing days of the 91st Congress?

All these measures are now dead and new bills must be introduced in the 92nd Congress. Yet, if President Nixon should send up the original version, he will alienate what liberal support has been recruited. If he sends up either of the last two versions, he runs the risk of antagonizing Congressmen Mills and Byrnes. Our guess is that he will not send up a bill but will hope that Ways and Means drafts its own version.

In the meantime, there are still some small voices in Washington saying that if we are to solve the welfare problem, it will not be through family assistance or welfare reform but through legislation providing housing, health, education and jobs.

FOOD STAMPS

On New Year's Eve, the Congress cleared for the White House the report of its joint House-Senate conference committee on extension of the Food Stamp Act of 1964, which expired that midnight. (See Report, December 21, 1970.) The measure was signed by President Nixon on January 11 and is now Public Law 91-671.

A provision in the House-passed bill requiring certain unemployed able-bodied persons to register for and accept employment as a condition of eligibility for receiving food stamps was somewhat modified by the conferees. However, as stated in the conference report (House Report 91-1793), it is stipulated that "certain able-bodied persons, including those employed and working for less than 30 hours per week, (will) be required to register for and to accept employment for jobs covered by State or Federal minimum wage laws or Federal wage regulations" to be eligible for food stamp benefits. Refusal to do so on the part of any one such person could mean loss of food stamps for the entire family, subject to a ruling from the Secretary of Agriculture.

The legislation extends the Food Stamp Act to June 30, 1973. The authorizations for funding are: $1.75 billion for the current fiscal year, ending June 30, 1971 (compared to the prior authorization of $1.42 billion), and such sums as may be necessary—that is, an "open-end" authorization—for the two following years.

Ask your Congressman for a copy of House Report (the conference report) 91-1793 and Public Law 91-671.

HEW APPROPRIATIONS

The legislation appropriating funds for the Departments of Health, Education and Welfare and of Labor and for the Office of Economic Welfare for the current fiscal year—the year that is now more than half over—was signed by the President on January 11. The two departments and OEO have been operating on contingency funds but now may make firm money commitments in the less than six months remaining of the 1971 fiscal year (ending June 30, 1971).

Selected figures in the new legislation are tabulated below. The fact is that while these are sums made available by the Congress, it is still basically the decision of the White House as to whether their full expenditure will be permitted.

Highlights of the Budget

1/30/71

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Jan. 29—Following are highlights of President Nixon's new budget:

DEFENSE—After two years of decline, the Pentagon budget is up $1.5-billion, to $76-billion, reflecting inflation, the pay increases by which the Administration hopes to move toward a volunteer army and new-weapon procurement that had been deferred during costlier phases of the Vietnam war. The budget banks on a continuing decline in the number of troops, planes and ships in the nation's arsenal.

ENVIRONMENT—President Nixon wants $2.5-billion, or nearly double what he asked last year, for antipollution programs, mostly for the construction of new sewage plants, with relatively minor amounts for clean air and solid-waste disposal programs. Appropriations for urban parks would go from $75-million to $200-million.

POVERTY—While the 5-year-old Office of Economic Opportunity is being reshaped as essentially a research organization, the budget declares that over-all spending on antipoverty projects is still growing, to an estimated $31-billion in 1972.

SCIENCE—For the first time in five years, the budget for research and development is up, to $16.7-billion. The space budget, while continuing its decline, is down only about $20-million.

HEALTH—There are hints—but no plans or figures—about basic insurance reforms. Three-quarters of the $16-billion health budget, and nearly all of the $1-billion growth, go to the Medicare and Medicaid programs, but there are also increases for birth control and medical training.

TRANSPORTATION—Highway construction still dominates the transport budget but as airport programs rapidly expand, highways get a smaller portion — 60 per cent — of the total than before. The Administration will renew its fight for the supersonic transport.

AGRICULTURE — Farm subsidies and price supports will cost $4.2-billion, little change from recent years. Food stamps for more than 10 million Americans will cost $2-billion.

CIVIL RIGHTS — The total of minority programs in about 75 agencies will cost nearly half a billion dollars, the budget declares, or half again as much as this year, with $100-million going to help school districts desegregate.

EDUCATION—Expenditures by the Office of Education will rise about $250-million, to $4.7-billion. The Administration will ask Congress next year for $1-billion more in loans for college students.

REVENUE—The first, incomplete details of the President's revenue-sharing plan include new categories of assistance and proposed funding levels. For example, $3-billion for education, $2.6-billion for transportation and $500-million for law enforcement.

CRIME — Law enforcement assistance appropriations will rise $166-million, to nearly $700-million, with a new emphasis on correctional programs. The Administration's expansion of the Federal Bureau of Investigation will continue.

Budget Asks More for Defense and Environment, With Shift of Poverty Programs

Following 2 Years of Decline, Pentagon Aims Budget Upward

By WILLIAM BEECHER

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Jan. 29—The defense budget, after two years of decline, is once more headed upward. The Nixon Administration's new budget proposal of $76-billion is $1.5-billion above expected spending for the current fiscal year ending June 30.

Reacting to predictable objections in Congress, Pentagon officials argued that, priced in fiscal 1972 dollars, the new budget represents a drop of $3.6-billion from the current budget year and only a $200-million increase over the last pre-Vietnam budget, in fiscal 1964.

Unaddressed by this assertion, however, is the fact that, beyond the admittedly sizable increases in military pay and matériel costs that are tracable to inflation, the 1972 budget includes major pay rises arising not only from inflation but also from a desire to make service careers more attractive as the Administration tries to move toward an all-volunteer armed force.

The new budget contemplates continuing decreases in the number of troops, planes and ships in the nation's arsenal. But it seeks to move in a substantial way to buy modern weapons long deferred during the height of the Vietnam war and to step up the development of strategic weapons against the possibility of failure [illegible] more for such planes as the Navy's F-14 air superiority fighter and S-3A and P-3C antisubmarine aircraft; $739-million more for destroyers, nuclear attack submarines and support ships, and $450-million more for such Air Force weapons as the nuclear-tipped short range attack missile and the Maverick air-to-ground tactical missile.

In the strategic weapons field, the Pentagon proposes spending $370-million, up from $75-million this year, to continue the program to design and build seven prototypes of the B-1 bomber, a possible successor to the B-52.

Several times since the start of the strategic arms limitation talks, Mr. Laird has warned that, unless progress toward an agreement can be achieved soon, the Administration cannot continue to delay indefinitely decisions to produce advanced weapons systems.

Pentagon officials said, however, that a procurement decision could not be made until next year, at the earliest, on whether to build the new missile submarine, and not until 1975 on the B-1 bomber.

But a sizable portion of the $926-million requested for the Minuteman-3 [illegible] plans and fit in the various components—model cities, urban renewal and so on—as they wished.

George Romney, Secretary of Housing and Urban Development, was asked at a news conference what the department would do to see that the money continud to go into areas of need. He said that was one of the details of the plan to be worked out later.

But all commitments that have been made will be fulfilled, including some $4-billion in urban renewal, even after the new plan takes effect, Mr. Romney said. And in the meantime, model city and other grants will continue under existing law, he added.

The new division in the department has already been informed under Floyd H. Hyde, Assistant Secretary for model cities, and will move as far toward the broad grant approcah as it can without new legislation. With money previously appropriated for model cities, the department will put into effect its plan for "planned variations" announced last year.

Programs to be consolidated here include the Appalachian Regional Commission, which assists depressed areas of Appalachia, economic development assistance under the Commerce Department and several categorical aids under the Agriculture Department—extension services, environmental assistance, water and sewer grants, forestry assistance, water bank program, conservation and tree planting.

"Under this new program," the budget message said, "funds will be distributed to states for use in rural areas. The development projects appropriate for each community will be determined by state and local governments according to the needs of that community."

Officials were vague on how rural development would be administered from Washington.

The proposed consolidation here includes those sections of the 1965 Secondary and Elementary Education Act dealing with special assistance for the disadvantaged (Title I), library services and supplementary services; vocational education, school lunch program, education for the handicapped and assistance to state departments of education.

"This program will provide support for educational activities in broad areas where the Federal Government has developed strong interests in strengthening school programs over the years," the budget message said. "The states would have discretion as to how they would accomplish each of the major purposes" contained in present programs.

Urban mass transit, airport grants, highway-related safety grants, state and communityt safety grants, Federal aided highways outside the interstate system and highway beautification would go into general transportation grants.

State and local governments, the message said, would determine how the funds would be spent to achieve "balanced transportation systems." "A pass-through provision in the sharing formula will assure that local governments receive an equitable share of this fund. Federal funding for the interstate highway system will be maintained separately until the completion of that program."

Federal law enforcement assistance to state and local governments is now being provided under the broad grant approach as prescribed under the Safe Streets Act of 1968. This is the only program listed under the revenue-sharing plan and presumably grants will continue to be distributed under the present system by the Law Enforcement Assistance Administration.

Under all six categories, no matching funds will be required. Under programs that would be replaced under the Nixon plan, state and local governments are now putting up about $4.25-billion in matching funds.

5 Programs Under New Agency Listed for Double the '71 Funds

By E. W. KENWORTHY

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Jan. 29 — President Nixon asked Congress in his Budget Message today to appropriate roughly twice as much in the next fiscal year for environmental protection as it did in the current year.

For the programs gathered into the new Environmental Protection Agency—water quality, air pollution, solid waste disposal, pesticide regulation, and radiation standards—the President's budget calls for appropriations totaling $2.5-billion. Last year, Congress appropriated $1.3-billion. (The 1971 total includes $13-million, and the 1972 figure $85-million in supplemental requests to be made later to finance requirements of the clean air and solid waste bills passed last year.)

Mr. Nixon's budget also provides for enlarging the environmental agency's staff over the next 18 months from 6,223 to 8,863—an increase of 2,640. Congressional committees dealing with the environment have been complaining that the air and water pollution offices are badly understaffed.

With the environment an increasingly popular issue, Congress is expected to meet the President's appropriations request as it did last year. If the request is approved, Mr. Nixon also plans a doubling of expenditures.

For the 1972 fiscal year, beginning next July 1, Mr. Nixon projected outlays totaling $1.4-billion as against $679-million in the current, or 1971, fiscal year. Expenditures run behind appropriations because funds for some projects such as sewage plants are paid out in [illegible] ranging from 30 to 55 per cent, depending on whether the states also bear part of the cost.

For 1971, the authorization under this program was $1.25-billion. Last January, Mr. Nixon proposed to supplant this program with a four-year, $10-billion program, with the Federal Government putting up $4-billion and the states and cities $6-billion. While the Federal Government would authorize contracts at $1-billion a year, appropriations would be scaled to payments for work completed and would be stretched out over nine years, beginning with $50-million in 1971.

Congress rejected the program as inadequate and appropriated $1-billion of the $1.25-billion authorized under the old statute.

Mr. Ruckelshaus, it is reported, persuaded Mr. Nixon to undertake a much larger program, and in legislation that will go to Congress in a few days, Mr. Nixon will propose a three-year, $12-billion program, with the states and cities putting up $6-billion, and the Federal Government $6-billion. Congress would appropriate $2-billion each year.

However, not all the Federal money would be for new projects. Twenty-five per cent would be set aside to pay for what are called "reimbursibles." This is money owed to states and cities for the Federal share of plants already finished, under construction or approved, which has not been paid because in the past the President has not asked, and Congress has not appropriated, enough money.

As of last Sept. 30, the amount of that, priced in fiscal 1972 dollars, the new budget represents a drop of $3.6-billion from the current budget year and only a $200-million increase over the last pre-Vietnam budget, in fiscal 1964.

Unaddressed by this assertion, however, is the fact that, beyond the admittedly sizable increases in military pay and matériel costs that are tracable to inflation, the 1972 budget includes major pay rises arising not only from inflation but also from a desire to make service careers more attractive as the Administration tries to move toward an all-volunteer armed force.

The new budget contemplates continuing decreases in the number of troops, planes and ships in the nation's arsenal. But it seeks to move in a substantial way to buy modern weapons long deferred during the height of the Vietnam war and to step up the development of strategic weapons against the possibility of failure in the current arms limitation talks.

Force Levels to Drop

Force levels are slated to drop 194,000, to 2.5 million men, lower by almost 200,000 from the pre-Vietnam force. The new budgetary assumption, officials said, is that roughly 100,000 more men would be withdrawn from Vietnam in the 12-month period starting July 1.

There are now about 335,000 military personnel in Vietnam. Under announced policy, this figure is scheduled to drop to 284,000 by May 1. Secretary of Defense Melvin R. Laird has reportedly informed President Nixon that, on the basis of his recent tour of the war zone, this withdrawal target could be increased, and a new goal established for May and June, the last two months in this fiscal year.

So, barring unforeseen reverses in Indochina, the total American force by mid-summer of 1972 might well be between 100,000 and 150,000 men. Pentagon officials said, however, that, if the Administration should decide to maintain a larger force in Vietnam than is being budgeted for, the additional cost would be financed from other military programs.

The weapons-modernization program calls for authority to obligate increased funds for Navy aircraft and ships, Air Force missiles, and Army tanks, trucks and other equipment.

Among the increases are $807-million air-to-ground tactical missile.

In the strategic weapons field, the Pentagon proposes spending $370-million, up from $75-million this year, to continue the program to design and build seven prototypes of the B-1 bomber, a possible successor to the B-52.

Several times since the start of the strategic arms limitation talks, Mr. Laird has warned that, unless progress toward an agreement can be achieved soon, the Administration cannot continue to delay indefinitely decisions to produce advanced weapons systems.

Pentagon officials said, however, that a procurement decision could not be made until next year, at the earliest, on whether to build the new missile submarine, and not until 1975 on the B-1 bomber.

But a sizable portion of the $926-million requested for the Minuteman-3 missile deployment, officials said, will be devoted to increasing the hardness of the Minuteman silos against possible nuclear attack.

The strategic portion of the budget also calls for $409-million to continue converting Polaris submarines to carry Poseidon missiles, each of which can carry up to 14 warheads, and $1.3-billion to continue deploying the Safeguard antimissile missile defense.

Highly placed officials said that President Nixon had not yet decided on the precise shape of his next Safeguard request to Congress. The Pentagon has recommended continued work on defenses around Minuteman complexes in Montana, North Dakota, Missouri, and Wyoming, and preliminary survey and engineering on a new deployment on the outskirts of the District of Columbia

In addition to $1.5-million in pay increases at the lower enlisted ranks, aimed at increasing enlistments, the Pentagon plans to spend $2.4-billion across the board in military and civilian pay increases.

Officials noted that this budget marks the first time when proposed future pay supplements were included in the defense spending estimate, rather than showing up separately as part of a Governmentwide pay increase. The effect is to show more nearly, at the time of budget submission, what total defense spending is expected to be for the year.

Revenue Sharing

Big Urban-Poverty Programs Would Be Shifted to Localities

By JOHN HERBERS

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Jan. 29—President Nixon proposed today that several of the largest and most controversial Federal urban and poverty programs be turned over to state and local governments in a special form of revenue sharing.

Included were programs for model cities, community action agencies, compensatory education, Appalachian aid, vocational education and manpower training.

The President's budget gave details not heretofore made public concerning the amounts of money that would be allocated to each of the six major program areas to be set up under the $11-billion special revenue-sharing program. An additional $5-billion has been budgeted for revenue sharing but in a separate program that will impose no restrictions on state and local governments on how the money is spent.

The categories and the amount of money that would be allotted for each during the first full year are urban development, $2-billion; rural development, $1-billion; education, $3-billion; manpower training, $2-billion; law enforcement, $.5-billion, and transportation, $2.6-billion.

However, Administration officials, from White House aides to department heads, said today it had not been decided precisely how these broad grants would work and how much Federal control might remain. Details are to be contained in legislation that Mr. Nixon will submit later to Congress.

State and local governments, the President said in his message, "would have far greater freedom of action in deciding how money is to be spent within each of the six areas." "For example," he said, "although the Federal Government would designate the total amount of special revenue sharing for education, the state or local area would decide how much is to be spent on new textbooks, new schools, equipment, and other matters of priority to it in the field of education."

A breakdown of the present programs that would be lumped under each category and how they would work under the proposed plan, insofar as the officials involved know at this time, follows:

Urban renewal, model cities, rehabilitation loans and grants for water and sewer facilities would be lumped under an urban development division in the Department of Housing and Urban Development. The community action agencies, the largest component of the Office of Economic Opportunity, would be moved into this division by Jan. 1, 1973.

The plan is for this division to make grants for community development directly to the cities, and also the states. The cities could then draw up their own of Appalachia, economic development assistance under the Commerce Department and several categorical aids under the Agriculture Department—extension services, environmental assistance, water and sewer grants, forestry assistance, water bank program, conservation and tree planting.

"Under this new program," the budget message said, "funds will be distributed to states for use in rural areas. The development projects appropriate for each community will be determined by state and local governments according to the needs of that community."

Officials were vague on how rural development would be administered from Washington.

The proposed consolidation here includes those sections of the 1965 Sec-

Federal funding for the interstate highway system will be maintained separately until the completion of that program."

Federal law enforcement assistance to state and local governments is now being provided under the broad grant approach as prescribed under the Safe Streets Act of 1968. This is the only program listed under the revenue-sharing plan and presumably grants will continue to be distributed under the present system by the Law Enforcement Assistance Administration.

Under all six categories, no matching funds will be required. Under programs that would be replaced under the Nixon plan, state and local governments are now putting up about $4.25-billion in matching funds.

Transportation

Administration Shows Optimism On Saving Supersonic Airliner

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Jan. 29—The Nixon Administration's new budget reevals an optimistic commitment to reviving the supersonic transport airplane, despite the political and practical problems that nearly killed the program last year.

In calling for an appropriation of $235-million for 1972 for further work on two test models, the budget assumes that Congress, when it takes up again in March the still unappropriated SST fund for 1971, will grant the full $290-million the Administration requested. Action in that item was delayed because Senate seemed determined to block it.

If Congress trims the $290-million sought for the current fiscal year, the appropriation for the next year would have to be comparably larger, or else the delivery date for operating aircraft, already stretched to late 1978, would face still further delays.

The budget also declares that "Federal funds will not be required after the flight testing" of the prototype craft in 1973, but few knowledgeable people in Congress or the aviation industry accept that prediction.

Over-all transportation spending for 1972, including maritime programs, is estimated at $8.26-billion, nearly one-fourth more than in President Johnson's last budget two years ago.

The Nixon Administration says that nonhighway programs account for a larger-than-ever fraction of the total. Yet highways still absorb 60 per cent of all Federal transport money, and highway spending, pegged at $4.79-billion for 1972, is still growing in terms of absolute dollars.

made later to finance requirements of the clean air and solid waste bills passed last year.)

Mr. Nixon's budget also provides for enlarging the environmental agency's staff over the next 18 months from 6,223 to 8,863—an increase of 2,640. Congressional committees dealing with the environment have been complaining that the air and water pollution offices are badly understaffed.

With the environment an increasingly popular issue, Congress is expected to meet the President's appropriations request as it did last year. If the request is approved, Mr. Nixon also plans a doubling of expenditures.

For the 1972 fiscal year, beginning next July 1, Mr. Nixon projected outlays totaling $1.4-billion as against $679-million in the current, or 1971, fiscal year. Expenditures run behind appropriations because funds for some projects such as sewage plants are paid out in stages as production proceeds.

The increase in total appropriations—about 88 per cent—is largely a result of one item: a doubling, from $1-billion to $2-billion, for Federal grants for municipal sewage plants.

The funds requested for the clean air and solid waste programs, although somewhat above last year's appropriations, fall far short of the authorizations in the bills passed last session, even when the "supplemental" $85-million is added to them.

However, William D. Ruckelshaus, environmental agency administrator, said yesterday that he believed the requests adequately reflected what could be efficiently spent.

There is certain to be Congressional criticism of the requests for air and solid waste programs, especially in the Senate Subcommittee on Air and Water Pollution, headed by Edmund S. Muskie, Democrat of Maine. But there will be also satisfaction over the requests made to finance the President's "parks for the people" program. He has asked full funding of the authorization under the law—$380 million—for national parks, and an increase in appropriations for "open spaces" in cities from $75-million to $200-million, with a rise in expenditures from $72-million to $100-million.

This is the breakdown for the programs in the Environmental Protection Agency:

Water Quality

OPERATIONS, RESEARCH AND FACILITIES. For these functions last year, Congress appropriated $116-million, slightly more than Mr. Nixon requested. This year he is asking $138-million. Most of it will be expended in the fiscal year.

WASTE TREATMENT GRANTS. Under present law, expiring next June 30, the Federal Government makes grants to cities for sewage treatment plants, the $1.25-billion authorized under the old statute.

Mr. Ruckelshaus, it is reported, persuaded Mr. Nixon to undertake a much larger program, and in legislation that will go to Congress in a few days, Mr. Nixon will propose a three-year, $12-billion program, with the states and cities putting up $6-billion, and the Federal Government $6-billion. Congress would appropriate $2-billion each year.

However, not all the Federal money would be for new projects. Twenty-five per cent would be set aside to pay for what are called "reimbursibles." This is money owed to states and cities for the Federal share of plants already finished, under construction or approved, which has not been paid because in the past the President has not asked, and Congress has not appropriated, enough money.

As of last Sept. 30, the amount of money that was or would become eligible for reimbursement totalled $1.4-billion, although the amount now due is $270-million. Unless states have firm assurance the reimbursibles will be paid, they will hesitate to advance more money to cities for sewage plants.

Air Pollution

Under the Clean Air Act passed last session, Congress authorized appropriations of $380-million for 1972. Mr. Nixon has asked for $129-million, plus whatever part of the supplemental $85-million he intends to use for air programs.

Further, in the bill, passed late in the session, Congress authorized $210-million for 1971. But, under a continuing resolution while the act was being passed, it appropriated only $106-million—the amount of the year before. All that Mr. Nixon is asking to make up this gap is $13-million, in a supplemental, which must be used to make up a similar gap in the solid waste program.

Solid Waste

In the solid waste bill last session, Congress authorized a 1972 appropriation of $172-million. Mr. Nixon is asking only $19.3-million, plus whatever share of the supplemental $85-million he allocates to solid waste.

For 1971, Congress authorized $50-million, but again under continuing resolution appropriated only $15-million. Again, the $13-million planned supplemental cannot fill this gap.

Pesticides

Last year's appropriation was $16.5-million. Mr. Nixon is asking for $17.2-million.

Radiation

For radiation standards, last year's appropriation was $6.8-million. Mr. Nixon is requesting $8.6-million.

Executive Office

Rising Presidential Staff Outlays Hint Nixon Power Consolidation

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Jan. 29—The budget for the fiscal year 1972, released today, lends statistical support to the judgment of most observers here that President Nixon has consolidated within his own executive office more power than any of his predecessors.

His executive staff, the budget indicates, is without question the largest in history. Meanwhile, estimated expenditures for the policymaking and personal machinery surrounding the President will rise by more than $5-million in the next fiscal year.

Expenditures for the executive office of the President, which includes everything from his $200,000 salary to the costs of operating policy-making units such as the National Security Council, totaled $36.3-million in the fiscal year 1970 and jumped to $49.8-million the following year.

A major reason for the increase was Mr. Nixon's decision to start counting as White House positions a large number of Government jobs whose occupants had worked for President Johnson while remaining on other agency payrolls. This was also a mojer reason for the sharp jump in personnel attached to the President's immediate personal staff—from 250 in the fiscal year 1970 to 533 the following year.

For the fiscal year 1972, the President's immediate staff—his speechwriters, press officers, political aides, secretaries, administrative personnel, and the like—will grow by only seven persons, to 540 permanent positions. Over-all expenditures for the executive office of the President however, will rise from a level of $49.8-million in the fiscal year 1971 to an estimated total of $55.2-million.

This is largely attributable to the following factors: the growth of the new Domestic Council under John D. Ehrlichman, to serve the President on domestic policy and programs; the creation of a new Council on Environmental quality, to advise Mr. Nixon on conservation issues; and the growth of the old Budget Bureau, now known as the Office of Management and Budget.

Science, Health and Priorities Are Among Topics Covered in Nixon's Message

Research, Development Money Increases After a 5-Year Decline

By HAROLD M. SCHMECK Jr.

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Jan. 29—The proposed Federal budget for the fiscal year 1972 appears to include the first real increase for scientific research and development in five years.

Whether the increase is real depends on how big an inflation factor is used in the calculations. Five per cent a year is commonly used.

The new budget figures show an increase of 7.6 per cent in obligations for research and development, bringing the 1972 total to $16.7 billion. There had been a steady drop from a peak of slightly more than $16-billion in 1967.

"One of the major objectives of this budget is to be certain that the country's basic sciences remain at the forefront," said Dr. Edward E. David Jr., the President's chief science adviser, during a briefing.

Social Objectives

As other key objectives, he cited advances in technology needed for solving some American social problems and increasing the effectiveness of the nation's defense forces.

Accordingly, the proposed budget included increased support of some areas of nonmilitary science and technology; a substantial increase in defense research and an indication that the decline in the size of the space effort may be coming to an end.

The budget proposes, for the space agency, total obligations of about $3,271,400,000, a decrease of only $216-million. The decline over the previous year was almost twice as great. Private employment in the space program will be virtually static at about 108,700 from July, 1971, through June, 1972.

One major item in the field of biomedical research was the proposal, announced in the President's State of the Union Message, for a large-scale war against cancer.

In the proposed budget, this would involve actual spending of about $30-million during fiscal 1972 but a total appropriation of $100-million. This money would be in addition to the $232,234,000 total appropriation for the National Cancer Institute, but there was no indication whether or not the institute and its parent organization, the National Institutes of Health, would be called upon to guide the project.

Government spokesmen said it had not been decided how the new cancer effort would be administered or by whom. This leaves open the possibility that a new cancer research authority might be set up, possibly as a separate agency.

Other areas of emphasis in biomedical research include diseases of the heart and [illegible] nantly among blacks. A spokesman for the National Heart and Lung Institute, which would administer the program, said most of the money would go to clinical studies of improved treatment methods for crises of the disease.

The proposed budget would give the National Science Foundation an increase of $149-million for obligations in research, development and related facilities, raising the total to $516-million.

The Department of Defense would be given an increase of $907-million for obligations for research and development. This would bring the total for fiscal 1972 to $8,469,000,800.

The overall objective, Dr. David said, is a smaller defense establishment made more effective by new sensing devices and weapons systems.

Emphasis in defense research will go to new and promising techniques based on research in oceanography and underwater sound, lasers and electronic devices of various kinds.

Funds for basic and applied research by the Atomic Energy Commission would decline under the proposed budget from $423-million in fiscal 1971 to $411-million in the coming year. Virtually all of the decrease is in research in the physical sciences, but it was expected that increases in the National Science Foundation's budget for science would at least offset that drop.

A.E.C. Funds Down

One major item in the A.E.C.'s research facilities program is $48-million for continuing construction of the huge 200-billion electron volt particle accelerator at Batavia, Ill., near Chicago. Total cost of the big research machine when complete will be about $250-million. It is expected that its first trial run will be this summer and that the next year will be spent in tuning it up.

Outlays for the civilian space program will decline by $216-million to $3.2-billion, partly because most of the spacecraft and rockets necessary for the Apollo program have already been paid for. Spending for the lunar program, budgeted at $612-million in the new proposals, has decreased by more than $1-billion since 1970. Three Apollo flights have been canceled, while the launching dates of the remaining four missions have been delayed. The final flight will be in December, 1972.

While Apollo is being phased out, work on the space agency's long-term dream, the orbital space shuttle, is accelerating. Funds for this program—to develop a reuseable spaceship that blasts into orbit like a rocket and returns to earth like an airplane—were $12.5-million in 1970, $80-million in 1971 and would go to $100-million next year.

A Number of Savings Proposed; Some Aren't Included in Totals

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Jan. 29 — President Nixon's budget, like its predecessors, includes a long list of proposals for savings, but the approach to Congress is somewhat different from past Presidential recommendations along these lines.

In a number of cases—for example, the proposed sale of the two Washington airports to private buyers—although the President's suggestions are recommended to Congress the savings are not included in his budget total as if Congress would approve the suggestions.

In other cases, Congressional approval is assumed and the savings are included in reaching the total budget expenditure of $229.2-billion.

The grand total of savings, from 50 separate items identified as "inefficient, obsolete or lower priority programs," is $2.9-billion in the fiscal year 1972, mounting to $3.7-billion in later years.

4 Main Items

Of this total, $1.9-billion in the fiscal year 1972 requires Congressional legislative action, with the biggest amounts in four items—revisions in Medicare, revisions in Medicaid, further sale of stockpiled materials and a change in farm operating loans to insured loans. At least the first three of these stand a good chance of Congressional approval, perhaps with modifications of the President's proposals.

Another $1-billion requires only Congressional decisions on appropriation bills—though even these are not necessarily assured — sometimes combined with action by the Administration. The big items here are elimination of the school milk program and termination or reduction of several aspects of the work of the Atomic Energy Commission and the National Aeronautics and Space Administration.

A final $400-million is in the category of recommendations to Congress without inclusion in the budget totals. In this group are any proceeds from the sale of the now barely profitable Washington airports — National and Dulles—and sale of the Alaska Railroad, which Congress refused to consider last year despite Mr. Nixon's recommendation.

Two long-standing items on Presidential "savings" lists—never accepted by Congress—are not included at all this time. They are the cutbacks in the agricultural conservation program and in the program of aid to "impacted" schools with large numbers of children of Federal civilian or military personnel.

Each would be modified, however, with presumed eventual savings. The impacted aid program would become part of the "special" revenue sharing program for the states in the general education category.

Priorities

An Order of Preference Urged To Avoid Wasting Resources

By PHILIP SHABECOFF

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Jan. 29—The Federal budget for 1972, massive as it is, is part of a still bigger economic aggregate—the trillion dollar United States economy.

For the second straight year, the Nixon budget contains a special section warning that national priorities must be established for the entire economy if the nation's resources are not to be dribbled haphazardly away.

And, for the first time, an array of data has been marshaled to put the budget in the context of total public and private spending and to show where the nation has been, where it is now and where it could be heading.

The Federal budget itself is described as a mirror of national priorities in stabilizing the economy and in allocating, distributing and making efficient use of national resources.

For example, the recent increase in spending by the Federal Government on medical care has meant more access to health services by the poor, a special chapter called "perspectives" says.

However, it acknowledged that the Government support for health programs, while causing a rapid rise of health's share of the gross national product between 1965 and 1969, produced a sharp rise in the demand for medical care, and, hence, in its cost, without a corresponding rise in quality.

Little Discretion Seen

The study suggests that the Federal Government has relatively small budgetary discretion with which to influence national priorities.

In 1975, for example, a "budget margin" of $12-billion is forecast for the Federal Government. This is the potential Federal surplus projected on the basis of current tax levels and assuming that there are no new Federal spending programs beyond those in the 1972 budget.

That the $12-billion figure is shaky is indicated by the fact that in last year's budget the "budget margin" for 1975 was projected at $22-billion. But the margin shrank by $10-billion in one year because of higher expenditures for revenue sharing, the cost of shifting to a volunteer army, new health programs and Government pay raises ,and lower revenues caused by liberalized business depreciation.

Calculation of the budget margin is based on a number of broad projections. Between 1972 and 1976, the gross national product—the value of all goods and services produced by the nation—is expected to rise by about $400-billion to over $1.5-thousand billions, or trillions. Inflation will be a part of this rise but the growth of national output in real terms is projected at 4.3 per cent a year.

Substantial increases in wages, other

While noting that the "Federal Government has a far-reaching impact on the allocation of economic resources," the long-range study also concedes that the impact often is unpredictable.

A major change in budgetary patterns is the forecast of a shift in decision-making responsibility in the use of national resources from the Federal Government to state and local governments and the private sector. The ratio of public spending at all levels is expected to increase.

But the question of altering national priorities by dropping or drastically reducing existing federal programs such as defense, is not directly addressed.

Indeed, defense spending, as such, is not even included as a separate listing in the projection but is submerged in an "all other" category, which also includes public spending on space and international programs, and private

Civil Rights

Increase of Almost 100% Asked For Programs to Aid Minorities

By PAUL DELANEY

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Jan. 29—President Nixon asked today for an increase of almost 100 per cent over last year in money to help minorities, the funds would support programs ranging from aiding school desegregation to fighting sickle cell anemia.

Administration officials put the total request for all civil rights activity at $456-million for the 1972 fiscal year. This compared with $235-million in 1971 and $94-million in 1970.

The biggest single portion, $100-million, would go to the emergency school assistance program to aid school districts in the process of desegregating.

Budget action relating to civil rights was aimed at appealing to minorities, a high Administration official said. For example, the inclusion of $5-million for research into sickle cell anemia, a disease found exclusively among blacks, "was to indicate to blacks that the Administration was committed to solving their problems," an official of the Department of Health, Education and Welfare commented.

Figures released by the Administration showed that funds for the Office of Contract Compliance, the Labor Department's unit that enforces equal hiring clauses in Government contracts, would go from $1.5-million to $2.5-million, a 67 per cent increase; and funds for the Office of Minority Business Enterprise, in charge of the Commerce Department's minority capitalism programs, would rise from $1.7-million to $3.1-million, or 82 per cent.

Fair housing and equal opportunity activity of the Department of Housing and Urban development would increase by 17 per cent, from $8.8-million to $10.3-million.

Otther rights agencies receiving increases would be the Civil Rights Commission, from $3.2-million to $3.7-million; the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, from $16-million to $26.5-million, and the Community Relations Service of the Justice Department, from $4.4-million to $5.4-million.

Officials reported that funding for civil rights activity in several other agencies would rise, some very appreciably, such as the Interior Department, from $2.4-million to $3.3-million; Atomic Energy Commission, from $958,000 to $1.4-million; Defense Department, from $13.7-million to $18.8-million and H.E.W., from $15.8-million to $325-million.

The huge increase in H.E.W.'s rights budget was a result of the inclusion of the $100-million for school desegregation aid.

Rein Put on Aid to Local Police; Corrections Expenditures Gain

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Jan. 29—The Nixon Administration has begun to apply the brakes on the rapidly accelerating program of Federal aid to local law enforcement, while increasing expenditures for corrections and the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

The new budget calls for appropriations of $698.4-million for the Law Enforcement Assistance Administration, an increase of $162.2-million over last year but markedly lower than the figure Justice Department officials were mentioning a year ago.

Attorney General John N. Mitchell and officials of the assistance agency had estimated that spending under the program might well exceed $1-billion in the coming fiscal year, and Congress authorized $1.15-billion in legislation passed at the end of the last session.

Richard W. Velde, associate administrator of the agency, pointed out that the requested figure was 10 times the size of the agency's budget in its first year, 1968.

The bulk of the funds have gone to upgrade police departments, but the agency is stressing corrections reform next year by increasing grants for penal improvement by $47-million. The Government also plans to increase spending for construction of Federal corrections facilities to $74.1-million from $22.1-million.

Although expansion of the Justice Department's Criminal Division and Bureau of Narcotics will be modest after recent rapid expansion, the F.B.I. is asking for 523 more agents. This increase, in addition to the 1,200 new agents added last year, will bring its total agent strength to 8,873, an increase of 34 per cent under the Nixon Administration.

New Legislation to Be Proposed For Big Increases in Student Aid

EDUCATION: Young "Sesame Street" visitor has a look at Big Bird, a regular on the educational TV series, for which the Administration is seeking an appropriation of $5-million.

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Jan. 29—In hard cash, the amount of money the Administration intends to spend on education in the coming fiscal year will rise only about 5 per cent, to $5.8-billion.

But new legislation will be proposed this coming year that may have a profound effect in the years to come on the manner in which many of the nation's young people finance their education.

For example, the Administration is seeking to double to $2-billion the amount of money that would be lent to college students. In addition, it will seek to triple to almost $1-billion assistance to college students through grants and work-study plans.

These proposed increases in help for higher education were described by one official as "the most significant aid to needy students in the history of H.E.W."

Despite these future intentions, the outlays of the Federal Office of Education are due to rise in the fiscal year 1972 by a modest $254-million, to $4.7-billion. Other education funds are disbursed elsewhere in the Federal Government. The Department of Labor, for example, provides manpower training programs.

Health

Medicare-Medicaid Funds Rise, But New Programs Seem Vague

By RICHARD D. LYONS

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Jan. 29 — The new budget gives few clues to the Administration's plans for what President Nixon, in his State of the Union Message, called "a new era in American medicine."

There were two vague references to a "family health insurance plan," an idea that Administration health planners have discussed for more than a year. The concept calls for the Federal Government to pay part or all of the premiums on private health insurance policies such as Blue Cross for low-income families. But the budget did not mention funds.

Private health maintenance organizations, whose potential role in controlling health care costs through preventive medicine is being studied by the Administration, would receive $2-million of the $16-billion that is to be spent on health in the coming fiscal year by the Department of Health, Education and Welfare.

The budget did not mention the so-called catastrophic health insurance idea that was also under study by the Administration. Under such insurance, the Federal Government, under some conditions, would foot some of the medical bills for middle-income families struck by particularly long and costly illnesses, such as cancer.

On New Year's Eve, Mr. Nixon signed the Emergency Health Personnel Act, which gave him authority to spend $60-million in the next 29 months to assign federally paid doctors and nurses to urban and rural areas lacking them. The budget contains no funds for this program.

The highest officials at Health, Education and Welfare insisted that Mr. Nixon would spell out his specific plans for health in a special message on the subject next month. But they also strongly implied that, whatever the innovations in health were, they would not go into effect until July, 1973, three years after Mr. Nixon first called attention to the "crisis in the national health care system" and the need to meet it.

What then did the health budget contain? Most of its funds go to Medicare and Medicaid—$12.4-billion of $16-billion. In fact, these two medical care programs will absorb all but $200-million of the $1.1-billion increase in the over-all health budget.

According to the Administration, the $888-million in additional Medicare and Medicaid outlays would have been almost doubled but for efficiencies that it plans for the programs. These savings, totaling $837-million, apparently will stem from forcing economies in hospital services and emphasizing preventive medicine, among other changes.

Elsewhere, outlays in the main health categories change relatively little. In the Public Health Service, for example, the Indian Health Service is to be granted an additional $15-million, but this is offset by a saving of $14-million resulting from the drop in Public Health Service support of eight hospitals and 30 clinics that dispense health care to merchant seamen.

The Administration will almost entirely substitute loans for direct grants to hospitals under the Hill-Burton program, which in the last two decades has allotted $1.6-billion.

Funds for birth control services will more than double, to $58-million.

tial Federal surplus projected on the basis of current tax levels and assuming that there are no new Federal spending programs beyond those in the 1972 budget.

That the $12-billion figure is shaky is indicated by the fact that in last year's budget the "budget margin" for 1975 was projected at $22-billion. But the margin shrank by $10-billion in one year because of higher expenditures for revenue sharing, the cost of shifting to a volunteer army, new health programs and Government pay raises ,and lower revenues caused by liberalized business depreciation.

Calculation of the budget margin is based on a number of broad projections. Between 1972 and 1976, the gross national product—the value of all goods and services produced by the nation—is expected to rise by about $400-billion to over $1.5-thousand billions, or trillions. Inflation will be a part of this rise but the growth of national output in real terms is projected at 4.3 per cent a year.

Substantial increases in wages, other personal income and corporate profits are also expected over the next five years.

A projection of private and governmental spending over a five-year period starting in 1969 makes the following general assertions:

¶Federal spending on defense and space will decline as a share of G.N.P. while spending on such things as housing and health will increase.

¶Americans will continue to spend a smaller proportion of their wealth on basic necessities such as food and clothing.

However, the budget raises more questions about national priorities than it answers.

1.6 spending for defense

The New York Times Jan. 30, 1971

While noting that the "Federal Government has a far-reaching impact on the allocation of economic resources," the long-range study also concedes that the impact often is unpredictable.

A major change in budgetary patterns is the forecast of a shift in decision-making responsibility in the use of national resources from the Federal Government to state and local governments and the private sector. The ratio of public spending at all levels is expected to increase.

But the question of altering national priorities by dropping or drastically reducing existing federal programs such as defense, is not directly addressed.

Indeed, defense spending, as such, is not even included as a separate listing in the projection but is submerged in an "all other" category, which also includes public spending on space and international programs, and private spending on recreation.

What the study does do, however, is come to grips with the complex interaction between Federal spending and the rest of the economy.

The $74-billion the Government will spend on goods and services for defense in the 1972 fiscal year has a direct impact on the economy. But other Government purchases could supplement or substitute for spending by state and local governments or by private citizens.

It is pointed out, for example, that after the Federal highway act was enacted, state and local spending on streets and highways dropped by nearly a third.

Poverty

Office of Economic Opportunity To Be Riddled, but Not Scuttled

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Jan. 29—The Office of Economic Opportunity launched in 1965 as the flagship of former President Johnson's War on Poverty will not be scuttled by President Nixon's new budget as some had predicted. But neither will it be a warship.

The budget and the President's associated revenue-sharing and reorganization plans would strip the agency of seven of its 10 major functions. What is more, the losses include the agency's biggest, and historically most central, function—community action.

This program was designed to give organization, services, and funds directly to poor people systematically overlooked by local governments. This year, about $360-million will be spent to support some 1,000 community action agencies.

But under the new revenue-sharing program starting in 1973, community action funds will be distributed to local governments after all.

"I'm confident they will continue to receive adequate funds," says Frank C. Carlucci, the Federal antipoverty agency's new director. "Unlike the climate in 1965, I believe most Mayors and Governors now appreciate the importance of the program."

In any event, the transfer of this and other programs would greatly diminish the agency. Volunteers in Service to America, a Peace Corps for disadvantaged domestic areas, is already scheduled for transfer into a new national service corps. The celebrated legal services program appears almost certainly destined for independent status. And other programs are slated for transfer to major departments or for elimination.

The result will be an agency strongly focused on research and development, a focus that has already been evident.

But a diminished agency does not mean a diminished concern for the poor, Mr. Carlucci insists. His aides lend support with a tabulation showing that the total Federal antipoverty spending will rise 10 per cent to $31.1-billion. They gave a figure of $32.9-billion last year, but they say this was based on inaccurate data and that the figure should have been $28.3-billion.

One of the major areas of increase is for antihunger programs. The principal ones, food stamps and reduced-price school lunches, together will increase as follows:

	1970	1971	1972
Food Stamps	$600-million	$1.4-billion	$2-billion
School Lunch	$45-million	$205-million	$237-million

The antihunger authorities say that these figures are good, but not as good as they look. For example, food-stamp participation is rapidly increasing but the $2-billion figure will not increase it further, they say, and will only cover the 1972 costs of those in the program at the end of 1971.

spending figure was determined on the basis of an estimate that if there were full employment, revenues would total $229.3-billion. Within that spending limit, the President made many choices. The following were some highlights of the budget:

¶Defense spending, after declining for two years, will increase slightly, partly reflecting higher pay for the armed services. Military spending will be about a third of the total budget.

¶There are no new proposed taxes of major significance, apart from the slightly higher Social Security tax in effect at the beginning of this month and a proposed increase in the Social Security wage base to $9,000, from $7,800, which Congress is likely to approve.

The vast upward sweep continues in the spending for "social" or "human resources" programs begun about five years ago. But some of this spending would be transferred into the President's proposed special program of sharing Federal revenues with the states, giving them more money and providing more state and local discretion on how to spend it within six broad categories.

The budget contains $3.75-billion for the first, partial year of Mr. Nixon's second revenue-sharing proposal, a general program giving money to the state with no strings attached. If this is not approved by Congress, or matched with equivalent spending in some other form, the budget will be that much less stimulative for the economy, starting in late 1971.

Despite the emphasis on shifting spending decisions to the state and local govern- Federal decisions. Mr. Nixon said that the giggest spending increases would involve health, the environment and law enforcement, with significant upward movement also in such areas as scientific research, airports and airways, civil rights and medical care for Vietnam veterans.

The President's Second Budget

WASHINGTON, Jan. 29—The numbers are overwhelming and the prose is simultaneously bloated and dense as usual. But among the dizzying charts and slogans of the second Nixon budget, there is at least as much political doctrine as there is economic strategy. Above all else, President Nixon is saying in this budget that, after a decade of Federal concern about what is done with social spending at home, he wants to concentrate for a while on how it is done.

News Analysis

Where his Democratic predecessor always devoted a special budget chapter to the concerns and programs of the poor, Mr. Nixon offers instead a special chapter on more "citizen control" through revenue sharing. It takes no statistician to demonstrate that this shift of emphasis conforms to a shift in the constituency now wooed by the White House.

The President is saying further, however, that, while the sharing of Federal revenues with lower levels of government requires the dismantling of many Great Society programs, he nonetheless embraces the legal and moral legacy of the Democrats who earmarked ever-larger sums for Social Seto be $3.75-billion. And a $100-million "total national commitment" to find a cancer cure turns out to mean $30-million more for the coming year.

This Administration has abandoned some of the most artful tricks of budget-juggling favored in preceding regimes, but Mr. Nixon's former distaste for inflated promises has now yielded to a whole array of capsule visions, including "Power to the People," "Freedom of Action," "Generation of Peace" and "New American Revolution."

The customary game of filling the budget message with politically self-serving charts and claims is further complicated this year by the vague new allocations to proposed revenue-sharing funds and contemplated government reorganizations.

There are many references, for instance, to new money and manpower training to help the poor and unemployed. But the removal of job training from the antipoverty agency and the planned dispersion of the effort among the states makes it almost impossible to determine

But the impulse toward a "revolution" in thinking about Federal power is unmistakable. Mr. Nixon wants to transfer the administration of social programs and the fights for money and power from Washington to the statehouses and city halls. Beyond that, in his budget discussion of prospects for the next five years, he makes plain his desire to enhance the decision-making power of the private sector and to diminish, among governments, the power of the Federal Establishment.

This concern with — and desire to campaign on — a platform of reform of government structure will be further augmented next year when Mr Nixon hopes to propose a similar "revolution" in the way that tax money is collected. In both taxation and spending techniques, he plainly wants to hold out the greatest aid and comfort to the small-home owners and other potential constituents in the suburbs.

The Changing Priorities

For the moment, the White House retains considerable freedom to determine the direction of public spending. Mr. Nixon's budget, bowing to public concern about this issue, frequently refers to the nation's changing priorities. But it of

Shultz, as Director, Worked Closely With President

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Jan. 29—The 1972 budget is the first prepared by the Office of Management and Budget, formed by the President last summer to replace the Bureau of the Budget and concentrate budget decision-making in the White House.

George P. Shultz, who resigned as Secretary of Labor to become director of the new office, and Casper W. Weinberger, the deputy director, were directly in charge of preparing the budget. But President Nixon entered the budget-making process far earlier than Presidents generally have in the past and was in closer day-to-day contact with the process through Mr. Shultz, who worked in an office in the White House itself.

This year there were no direct appeals to the President by departmental secretaries and other agency heads about their allocations. The appeals were made through Mr. Shultz and Mr. Weinberger, usually with Henry A. Kissinger or John D. Ehrlichman, respectively the President's top assistants, who worked together during post-

A Concerned Taxpayer

Jerry Lerman

By RICHARD L. MADDEN

As Jerry Lerman was driving to work yesterday morning, the news broadcast on his car radio reported that President Nixon was sending a proposed $229.2-billion Federal budget to Congress for the next fiscal year. "It's difficult for most people to think in terms of $229-billion," Mr. Lerman said as he steered through the traffic on the Triborough Bridge. "They don't even know what $1-billion is." To Mr. Lerman, who is a 49-year-old general manager of a toy manufacturing plant in the South Bronx and a homeowner in Bayside, Queens, and to most New Yorkers the Federal budget may seem like an abstract document.

Man in the News

Nonetheless it will affect Mr. Lerman and his fellow New Yorkers. The budget calls for Federal spending of slightly more than $1,100 for every person in the United States.

How much of that will reach Mr. Lerman and others in this city will depend on such things as Congressional action on Mr. Nixon's proposals for revenue sharing and welfare reform and also on the way Federal grants for other purposes are passed back to New York.

No New U.S. Tax

For one thing, Mr. Lerman will not be asked to pay higher Federal income tax rates. "That's a nice touch and I'm appreciative," Mr. Lerman said. "But that's not the answer. Federal income taxes may not be going up, but the state is going up and the city is going up and it's the dollars on the bottom line that count."

The President's revenue-sharing proposal, which calls in part for $5-billion in new Federal funds to be returned to the states and cities with no strings on how it would be spent and which would yield an estimated total of $534-million for the state, could provide some long-range help if Congress approves it.

"I don't think it will be passed," Mr. Lerman said. "What he is asking for is minimal. I think it's good, but he has asked for minimal numbers."

Among other things, budget calls for outlays of $3.9-billion, an increase of $900-million for water resources, including water pollution abatement programs, which could aid in cleaning up the waterways around New York.

"That's very important," Mr. Lerman said as he neared his loft building on Walnut Avenue near the East River. "There's no question that they can clean up the waters, but it's not a one- or three-year project. It more closely borders on eight to 12 years."

The proposal to more than double the funds to $200-million to provide more recreational areas in and near the cities, could aid development of the proposed Gateway National Recreation Area at the entrance to New York harbor. But Mr. Lerman questioned whether the money would be significant.

"When you're talking about a recreation area serving about 20 million people, there shouldn't be any question about it."

Mr. Lerman said that he and his wife, Ellen, and their two daughters, Janet, 18 years old, and Nancy, 16, sometimes use Jones Beach on Nassau County's south shore, but he was not sure whether they would take much advantage of the proposed recreation area.

Mr. Lerman, a quiet, friendly man with rather long gray sideburns, may be somewhat representative of other New Yorkers with sharing proposal, a general program giving money to the state with no strings attached. If this is not approved by Congress, or matched with equivalent spending in some other form, the budget will be that much less stimulative for the economy, starting in late 1971.

He was born in Harlem but has lived most of his life in Queens and now has a "normal American cheesebox house with a picture window overlooking the gas station." He is an enrolled Democrat but doesn't remember the last time that he voted a straight party ticket.

Mr. Lerner doesn't think that he gets his money's worth from the Federal Government from the tax dollars he pays because he regards government at most levels as inefficient. He would like to see the Federal Government take over the cost of welfar. He doesn't see the Government having too much success in cutting defense spending dollar, because defense needs are "dictated by powers outside the United States."

He said that he does try to keep informed about such matters as Federal budgets. "A large number of people here are in the 25 to 33 per cent tax bracket," he said. "A taxpayer has to be an idiot not to be aware."

Despite the emphasis on shifting spending decisions to the state and local govern- Federal decisions. Mr. Nixon said that the giggest spending increases would involve health, the environment and law enforcement, with significant upward movement also in such areas as scientific research, airports and airways, civil rights and medical care for Vietnam veterans.

Four areas of Federal spending that have produced wide debate have essentially stabilized — farm subsidies, space, highways, and what is sometimes called "pork barrel" spending for public works by the Bureau of Reclamation and the Army Corps of Engineers. All have shown little change for three years or more, and all represent a much smaller portion of the total budget than they used to—now about $13-billion, or 6 per cent, taken all together.

Calls for Strong Policy

Although the impact that budget deficits has upin voters is uncertain, and may be small, Mr. Nixon's budget, with the "full Employment" theory behind it, established a record of sorts. Except for the years of World War II, this was the largest deficit ever estimated by any President, Republican or Democrat, in a January budget, as distinct from the deficit actually realized by the end of the fiscal year.

High officials disclosed that the budget could have been squeezed to as low as $225-billion, with a resulting smaller deficit, but that the President had decided the state of the economy called for a strongly stimulative policy — meaning spending right up to the hypothetical level of full employment revenues.

The President said, "In this way the budget is used as a tool to promote orderly economic expansion, but the impact of the resulting actual deficit is in sharp contrast to the inflationary pressure created by the deficits of the late sixties, which were the result of excessive spending that went far beyond full employment revenues."

Mr. Nixon emphasized that the full employment budget principle, while justifying a deficit in current conditions, "imposes the discipline of an upper limit on spending, a discipline that is essential because the upward pressures on outlays are relentless."

The combination of the large deficits of the fiscal years 1971 and 1972 will add greatly to the national debt. What is called the "gross Federal debt" will rise from $3671-billion in mid-1969 to an estimated $429.4-billion in mid-1972.

Of this total, about $115-billion is debt the Government "owes to itself," mainly Treasury securities held by the Social Security Trust Fund and the Federal Reserve Banks. The debt owed to the public will rise from $279.5-billion in mid-1969 to an estimated $313.1-billion in mid-1972.

The President's message used unusually sharp language in its discussion of Congressional delays in dealing with appropriations and other bills affecting the budget. He said that the present budget system, begun in 1921, once worked well but that, "because of Congressional inaction, it has become a travesty a halfcentury later."

The President is saying further, however, that, while the sharing of Federal revenues with lower levels of government requires the dismantling of many Great Society programs, he nonetheless embraces the legal and moral legacy of the Democrats who earmarked ever-larger sums for Social Security, medical care and education. Indeed, Mr. Nixon points with pride to the largely uncontrollable fact that the biggest slice of his budget pie is to be invested in "human resources."

The President has also linked arms with the Democrats in embrace of a deficit budget. His conversion was heralded last year, but the new budget formally ends a once bitter and often demagogic controversy and proclaims the now bipartisan faith that a sluggish economy can be roused with red ink.

And there is throughout this budget a new indication of Mr. Nixon's belief that a sluggish electorate can be roused with some purple prose and numbers.

An expansively advertised "new comprehensive health strategy" turns out to be something planned for the fiscal year 1973. A $5-billion program of general revenue sharing with the states turns out inflated promises has now yielded to a whole array of capsule visions, including "Power to the People," "Freedom of Action," "Generation of Peace" and "New American Revolution."

The customary game of filling the budget message with politically self-serving charts and claims is further complicated this year by the vague new allocations to proposed revenue-sharing funds and contemplated government reorganizations.

There are many references, for instance, to new money and manpower training to help the poor and unemployed. But the removal of job training from the antipoverty agency and the planned dispersion of the effort among the states makes it almost impossible to determine the net increase of Federal support in this area. Similarly, food-stamp expenditures are significantly increased, but lesser-known food programs are being collapsed, leaving the net effect unclear.

The whole revenue-sharing proposal, despite the rhetorical attention lavished on it, is only beginning to take shape in this budget. It promises about $4-billion in new money for the year starting July 1 to underwrite the proposition that as much as $14-billion should be distributed among the states and cities with few strings attached.

But the contemplated rules for this are still being devised and revised. The fine print may yet turn out to be more limiting than the President had hoped and promised. And no one has yet figured out how to keep his pledge to enforce Federal laws against discriminatory use of these "untied" funds.

This concern with [illegible] and desire to campaign on — a platform of reform of government structure will be further augmented next year when Mr Nixon hopes to propose a similar "revolution" in the way that tax money is collected. In both taxation and spending techniques, he plainly wants to hold out the greatest aid and comfort to the small-home owners and other potential constituents in the suburbs.

The Changing Priorities

For the moment, the White House retains considerable freedom to determine the direction of public spending. Mr. Nixon's budget, bowing to public concern about this issue, frequently refers to the nation's changing priorities. But it offers almost no description or justification for the choices actually made.

Who is ending the military draft worth $1.5-billion and help to housing only $600-million? Why should Social Security benefits rise by $4.5-billion while aid to education rises by $300-million? How can the citizen weigh the national security interest in spending $1.5-billion more for Navy ships and planes as against the national interest that might be served by raising support for the poor above $1,600 a year?

Even in a budget that questions the wisdom, perception and efficiency of the giant domestic bureaucracies, Mr. Nixon is proposing an increase in military spending on the authority of the estimates of the largest and most voracious bureaucracy of them all. The Pentagon's big set of numbers may be right, but, as offered today, they are just staggering numbers.

George P. Shultz, who resigned as Secretary of Labor to become director of the new office, and Casper W. Weinberger, the deputy director, were directly in charge of preparing the budget. But President Nixon entered the budget-making process far earlier than Presidents generally have in the past and was in closer day-to-day contact with the process through Mr. Shultz, who worked in an office in the White House itself.

This year there were no direct appeals to the President by departmental secretaries and other agency heads about their allocations. The appeals were made through Mr. Shultz and Mr. Weinberger, usually with Henry A. Kissinger or John D. Ehrlichman, respectively the President's top assistants in foreign and domestic matters, also present.

This system of channeling appeals through O.M.B. and the White House staff was adopted, according to one official, because "the President decided he wouldn't make off-the-cuff decisions on the basis of being pulled off in the corner by someone."

Otherwise, the budget-making process was essentially unchanged from the past.

That process began early in 1970, almost as soon as the President had finished delivering his last budget message. The O.M.B., together with the Treasury, the Council of Economic Advisers and others, examined general economic conditions, revenue expectations and policy needs. At the same time, each large agency

Developments Changed Current Budget

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Jan. 29—The recession, those angry Post Office Department workers in New York City, welfare-rights leaders and a majority of those in Congress unknowingly worked together during past months to turn the Government's budget for this current year into something that is a far cry from what President Nixon foresaw this time last year.

A year ago, the budget for the fiscal year 1971 was sent to Congress containing a small surplus, $1.3-billion, with anticipated spending of $200.8-billion and expecting revenues of $202.1-billion.

The new budget, with re-estimates for the current fiscal year, which won't be over until June 30, tells quite a different story.

In place of the surplus of $1.3-billion, a deficit of $18.6-billion is now predicted—the second largest of the entire post-World War II period. The quantity of red ink has been exceeded in that period only by President Johnson's performance in the fiscal year 1968, when the deficit was $25.2-billion.

What happened?

First of all, tax collections went right through the floor—a direct result of the recession that brought higher unemployment, smaller paychecks for many who kept their jobs, and reduced corporate profits.

They are currently expected to total only $194.2-billion, a drop of $7.9-billion from the January, 1970, estimate.

The recession was felt on the spending side of the budget, too. For instance, unemployment benefits, including those for veterans, were up $2.3-billion.

As is well-known, welfare rolls increased dramatically almost everywhere, so the Federal share increased, too, by nearly a billion. The increase in welfare applicants is believed to be tracable not so much to the recession, however, as to spreading knowledge of eligibility for welfare among poor persons. The welfare rights activists have contributed greatly to this spread.

Inflation affected the budget, too. The increase in budget interest payments, caused mainly by the rise in interest rates, amounted to nearly $2-billion.

As for those postal workers, their strike and its settlement ultimately resulted in a larger-than-planned Federal pay increase, for the postal employes themselves, for other of Government civilian employes, and for the military. The increase, over what had originally been budgeted, was $2.3-billion.

President Hails Budget In White House Signing

WASHINGTON, Jan. 29 (AP) — President Nixon formally signed and sent to Congress today two green leather-bound volumes setting out the $229-billion budget by which he hopes to stimulate the nation's economy.

He commented at the White House ceremony that his advisers were "absolutely correct" in saying that the budget was expansionary but not inflationary.

He said this was "the finest budget preparation we've had and also the most difficult task" because of such new concepts as revenue sharing.

The President used four pens in signing the formal document and handed them to George P. Shultz, director of the Office of Management and Budget; Caspar W. Weinberger, deputy director; Arnold R. Webber, associate director, and Sam M. Cohn, an assistant director for budget preparation.

Tass Says U.S. Budget Points Up Difficulties

Speaker of House Describes Budget As 'Step Forward'

WASHINGTON, Jan. 29 (AP) —House Speaker Carl Albert, Democrat of Oklahoma, said today the Administration's proposed $229.2-billion budget was "a major step forward for a Republican President."

Mr. Nixon's reversal of his party's traditional "balanced budget" monetary policy prompted Mr. Albert to say, "I welcome Republican conversion to Keynesian economy a full generation after it was accepted by the Democrats."

But the Speaker said Mr. Nixon must do more than call for $30.2-billion in deficit spending this year to curb inflation and unemployment.

Senator Hugh Scott of Scott of Pennsylvania, Republican Senate leader, said Mr. Nixon's plan "is what the Democrats should have done in 1965."

The House Republican leader, Gerald Ford of Michigan, called the budget a "carefully drawn fiscal plan which stands out as perhaps the first Federal budget to help promote full employment and peacetime prosperity."

Representative George H. Mahon, Democrat of Texas, chairman of the House Appropriations Committee, which must pass on all money bills, recalled that the administration predicted a $1.3-billion surplus during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1971. Analyists now forecast an $18.6-billion deficit. Calling this country is a nation of spenders, he said, "We don't need any undue encouragement, and I'm afraid this budget gives undue encouragement."

official estimates of what the unemployment rate would be at any point in the future. It was 6 per cent of the work force in December.

George P. Shultz, the director of the Office of Management and Budget, said that the unemployment rate should be "approaching the zone of full employment," which is defined as an unemployment rate of 4 per cent, by the end of the calendar year 1972.

He also predicted that the unemployment rate for all of 1971 would be "near" that for 1970, which was 4.94 per cent. But this year, it would be going down, not up.

Mr. Shultz, who is an economist, said that the "best evidence" in support of the Administration's economic forecast was "in terms of the shifts in policy that have been in effect for several months — some since last summer—and the certainty that these shifts in policy are going to produce a shift in the outlook for the economy."

Expression of Confidence

In other words, he was expressing confidence that the liberalization of monetary policy by the Federal Reserve and the looser budget policy of the Administration would work to stimulate economic recovery.

The Budget Message itself explained, in somewhat more detail than has previously been available, the Administration's rationale in using the "full-employment budget" as the standard against which to measure prudent levels of government spending.

By limiting spending to an amount equal to the Federal tax collectins that the economy would generate if it were operating at 4 per cent unemployment, "the impact of the resulting actual deficit is in sharp contrast to the inflationary pressure created by the deficits of the late sixties," Mr. Nixon said. He noted that not only was the new budget for the 1972 fiscal year in approximate balance, but also that the fiscal year 1972 would be the fourth consecutive year of approximate balance.

The full-employment surplus in the fiscal year 1969 was $100-million, in 1970, $2.6-billion, and in the current fiscal year it is expected to be $1.4-billion.

Deficit and Full Employment

Officials said that the Nixon Administration generally believed that it would never be wise — absent a sudden outbreak of war or other emergency—to run a deficit on the full-employment basis. This view contrasts with that of economists in the Kennedy and Johnson Administrations, who held that in a recession a deficit on the full-employment basis might be desirable.

ficulty in turning off Federal ex-reason for opposing a full-employment deficit was the difficult in turning off Federal Expenditures once they are turned on. If spending is permitted to rise above full-employment receipts in a recession year, he said, it may be politically and otherwise impossible to bring the spending down to full employment levels the following year, when the recession is over.

The calculation of what the gross national product would be at full employment, and the resultant tax collections, are explained in the budget document. The computations are not a matter of particular controversy among economists.

The estimate that the actual gross national product will reach $1,065-billion in the calendar year 1971 incorporates an estimate that personal income will rise from its 1970 level of $801-billion to $868-billion.

Also included is an estimate that corporate profits will rise from $82-billion to $98-billion, which is a very large rise, both absolutely and proportionally.

Mr. Shultz said the big rise in profits was expected partly because that always happens in a period of recovery from a recession, as productivity rises sharply, and partly because corporations have moved so vigorously to "cut fat" in their operations and thus lower their costs.

Under Secretary of the Treasury Charles E. Walker also noted that corporate profits as a share of the gross national product were low by historical standards, even for a recession year, in 1970. The estimated rise in 1971 would still leave them lower than for any recent year except last year.

Text of President's Message to Congress on Federal Budget for Fiscal Year 1972

WASHINGTON, Jan. 29—Following is the text, photographically reproduced, of President Nixon's Budget Message as presented to Congress today:

To the Congress of the United States:

In the 1971 budget, America's priorities were quietly but dramatically reordered: For the first time in 20 years, we spent more to meet human needs than we spent on defense.

In 1972, we must increase our spending for defense in order to carry out the Nation's strategy for peace. Even with this increase, defense spending will drop from 36% of total spending in 1971 to 34% in 1972. Outlays for human resources programs, continuing to rise as a share of the total, will be 42% of total spending in 1972.

The 1972 budget has a historic identity of its own.

- It provides a new balance of responsibility and power in America by proposing the sharing of Federal revenues with States and communities on a grand scale—and in a way that will both alleviate the paralyzing fiscal crisis of State and local governments and enable citizens to have more of a say in the decisions that directly affect their lives.
- It introduces a new fairness in American life, with the development of national strategies to improve the health care of our citizens and to assure, with work incentives and requirements, an income floor for every family in this Nation.
- It adopts the idea of a "full employment budget," in which spending does not exceed the revenues the economy could generate under the existing tax system at a time of full employment. In this way, the budget is used as a tool to promote orderly economic expansion, but the impact of the resulting actual deficit is in sharp contrast to the inflationary pressure created by the deficits of the late sixties, which were the result of excessive spending that went far beyond full employment revenues. The full employment budget idea is in the nature of a self-fulfilling prophecy: By operating as if we were at full employment, we will help to bring about that full employment.

The 1972 budget reaffirms the determination of the Federal Government to take an activist role in bringing about the kind of prosperity that has rarely existed in the American economy—a prosperity without war and without runaway inflation. In the 1972 budget, the Government accepts responsibility for creating the climate that will lead to steady economic growth with improving productivity and job stability.

Of course, our objective of prosperity without inflation cannot be achieved by budget policy alone. It also requires:

—the monetary policy adopted by the independent Federal Reserve System to provide fully for the growing needs of the economy; and —increased restraint in wage and price decisions by labor and business—in their own and the Nation's interest and as a matter of common sense.

Only by working together can the budget, monetary policy, and common sense in the private sector make orderly expansion the order of the day.

The full employment 1972 budget—expansionary but not inflationary—does its full share to provide a defense strong enough to protect our national security, higher standards of income and care for the poor and the sick, a reorganized and responsive Federal structure, and the basis for a sound prosperity in a full generation of peace.

TOWARD A GROWING NONINFLATIONARY ECONOMY

Economic setting.—When I took office 2 years ago, rampant inflation was the Nation's principal economic problem.

This inflation was a direct result of the economic policies of the period 1966 to 1968, when we were mired in war in Vietnam, and when Federal spending rose sharply. Federal outlays were allowed to exceed full-employment revenues by $6 billion in 1966, $10 billion in 1967, and $25 billion in 1968. Expansive monetary policy in the summer of 1968 helped upset the hoped-for stabilizing impact of an income tax surcharge. The effect of these actions was to turn the thermostat up in an economy that was already hot enough.

My administration acted promptly to move us out of that war and

But the grant structure has become a haphazard collection of hundreds of separate programs, each with its own policies, its own requirements and procedures, and its own funding.

Such a complicated method of providing Federal assistance is not only inefficient, but it:

—restricts the freedom of State and local governments to spend funds in accordance with their priorities;
—is unresponsive to the needs of specific local situations because the funds are distributed and regulated by guidelines that do not—perhaps cannot—sufficiently take account of differences among local communities; and
—separates resources and responsibility, because State and local governments have the responsibility for providing services, but, all too often, they do not have the money to provide those services. The Federal Government dominates the field of income taxation, and its redtape restricts the discretion of State and local governments over the services they provide.

Clearly, not enough authority over the use of resources for federally assisted programs is now lodged at the State and local level. More —for State and local governments, it will not only help meet the current financial crisis, but will also wipe out rigidities and delays in Federal aid and permit them to build their capacity to respond to local needs; —for our federal system, it will provide new strength by assigning services to the level of government best equipped to perform them; and —for all our people, it will provide a means of encouraging local diversity and experimentation within the framework of our great national purposes.

Of course, these revenue sharing proposals will not be the vehicle for any retreat from the Federal Government's responsibility to ensure equal treatment and opportunity for all. The proposals I send to the Congress will include the safeguards against discrimination that now accompany all other Federal funds allocated to the States.

This massive revenue sharing proposal is central to my philosophy of giving people the opportunity to become more involved in the decisions that affect their lives. The magnitude of the problem calls for this kind of bold move; by acting decisively and without delay, we will strengthen our federal system and respond better to the needs of our people.

Welfare reform.—One of the first steps in our review of the federal system was to sort out those activities that are appropriate for the Federal Government from those that are best performed at the State and local level or in the private sector. We decided early on one primary Federal responsibility—providing, with a combination of work incentives and work requirements, an income floor for every American family.

We knew beforehand that the existing welfare system was in desperate need of reform. We also knew that the existing system imposes a crushing and growing financial burden on States.

My welfare reform proposals, described later in this message, are an integral part of our effort to give people the ability to make their own decisions, to build the capacity of State and local government, and to encourage more orderly national growth.

By building a floor under the income of every family everywhere in America with Federal funds, we provide each dependent family a new dignity, we help State and local governments finance what is now their fastest growing expenditure, and we remove one magnet that has already drawn too many persons to our congested cities.

In government operations, form should follow function. Just as revenue sharing decentralizes power to meet one need, welfare reform sets a basic national standard to meet a different need. The decision to centralize or decentralize should be based on which method best serves the larger purposes of 206 million Americans.

Revenue sharing and welfare reform are of a piece: the level of government best equipped to respond should respond in a way that raises standards and contributes to the sum of personal freedom and human dignity.

System to provide fully for the growing needs of the economy, and —increased restraint in wage and price decisions by labor and business—in their own and the Nation's interest and as a matter of common sense.

Only by working together can the budget, monetary policy, and common sense in the private sector make orderly expansion the order of the day.

The full employment 1972 budget—expansionary but not inflationary—does its full share to provide a defense strong enough to protect our national security, higher standards of income and care for the poor and the sick, a reorganized and responsive Federal structure, and the basis for a sound prosperity in a full generation of peace.

TOWARD A GROWING NONINFLATIONARY ECONOMY

Economic setting.—When I took office 2 years ago, rampant inflation was the Nation's principal economic problem.

This inflation was a direct result of the economic policies of the period 1966 to 1968, when we were mired in war in Vietnam, and when Federal spending rose sharply. Federal outlays were allowed to exceed full-employment revenues by $6 billion in 1966, $10 billion in 1967, and $25 billion in 1968. Expansive monetary policy in the summer of 1968 helped upset the hoped-for stabilizing impact of an income tax surcharge. The effect of these actions was to turn the thermostat up in an economy that was already hot enough.

My administration acted promptly to move us out of that war and cool the superheated economy.

We controlled Federal spending in 1969 and achieved a budget surplus. Spending was restrained again in 1970. Independently, the Federal Reserve System maintained a monetary policy of restraint which increased in severity throughout calendar year 1969 and continued into early 1970.

The forces of inflation have been durable and persistent—and they remain strong. But their momentum was slowed in calendar year 1969 and early 1970. Excessive demand was eliminated as a source of inflationary pressure during this period. The turnaround of this inflationary trend permitted us to enter the second phase of our plan: to follow more expansive economic policies without losing ground in the battle against inflation.

Budget policy.—Last July, I set forth the budget policy of this administration:

"At times the economic situation permits—even calls for—a budget deficit. There is one basic guideline for the budget, however, which we should never violate: except in emergency conditions, expenditures must never be allowed to outrun the revenues that the tax system would produce at reasonably full employment. When the Federal government's spending actions over an extended period push outlays sharply higher, increased tax rates or inflation inevitably follow."

Executive Office of the President, Bureau of the Budget

The principle of holding outlays to revenues at full employment serves three necessary purposes:

- It imposes the discipline of an upper limit on spending, a discipline that is essential because the upward pressures on outlays are relentless.
- It permits Federal tax and spending programs to be planned and conducted in an orderly manner consistent with steady growth in the economy's productive capacity.
- It helps achieve economic stability by automatically imposing restraint during periods of boom and providing stimulus during periods of slack.

The budget policy of this administration is to keep firm control over Federal spending. The outlay total of $229.2 billion in 1972 is the sum of spending for programs that were scrutinized carefully to make certain that they would be managed effectively and efficiently, and that they are essential to carry out present laws or to achieve desirable changes in our national priorities.

If this careful scrutiny were not maintained—if we weaken in our resolve to control spending—we would risk permitting outlays to build up a momentum that will carry them beyond full employment receipts in the longer run, and we would risk losing the ability to restrain spending in times when a deficit is undesirable.

SUMMARY OF THE 1972 BUDGET

The budget that I propose for 1972 is consistent with the fiscal policy I announced 6 months ago.

[1] Including loans in expenditure account.
[2] Excluding loans held by Government or Government-sponsored agencies.

Budget receipts in 1972 are estimated to be $217.6 billion, $23.4 billion more than in 1971, but still below the $229.3 billion of revenue that would be produced if the economy were operating at full employment throughout the year.

The estimates reflect a reduction in revenues of $2.7 billion due to the new tax depreciation rules announced on January 11. These rules are part of our plan to expand the economy and help the Nation achieve full employment without inflation.

Budget outlays in 1972 are expected to be $229.2 billion, an increase of $16.4 billion over the previous year.

The increase in outlays will help move the economy toward higher employment and production. At the same time, outlays are being held to full employment receipts.

I am requesting budget authority—the right to make commitments to spend—of $249.0 billion in 1972. Over $170 billion of this total will require new action on the part of the Congress.

REVENUE SHARING: RETURNING POWER TO PEOPLE

During the 1960's, more governmental initiative and power shifted to Washington and away from elected officials in State and local governments. Towards the end of the decade it became apparent that, despite new programs and massive Federal expenditures, government at all levels was not working well.

When this administration took office, I directed that an intensive review of our governmental system be made. We found that State and local governments were breaking down under an incredible fiscal burden. We also found that the red tape involved in the narrow categorical grant system made it almost impossible for the Federal Government to be effective and responsive to the needs of individuals in different localities.

The financial squeeze on State and local governments is acute, and shows no sign of becoming less painful. These governments rely mainly on receipts from consumer and property taxes, which have not grown nearly as fast as the demand for State and local government services. As a result, combined State and local debt has increased by over 600% since 1948.

The Federal Government helped meet some of this demand by increasing its financial aid, largely through grant programs, which now accounts for 18% of State and local revenues.

The results of grant programs have been impressive in some cases. But the grant structure has become a haphazard collection of hundreds of separate programs, each with its own policies, its own requirements and procedures, and its own funding.

Such a complicated method of providing Federal assistance is not only inefficient, but it:

—restricts the freedom of State and local governments to spend funds in accordance with their priorities;
—is unresponsive to the needs of specific local situations because the funds are distributed and regulated by guidelines that do not—perhaps cannot—sufficiently take account of differences among local communities; and
—separates resources and responsibility, because State and local governments have the responsibility for providing services, but, all too often, they do not have the money to provide those services. The Federal Government dominates the field of income taxation, and its redtape restricts the discretion of State and local governments over the services they provide.

Clearly, not enough authority over the use of resources for federally assisted programs is now lodged at the State and local level. More of the power—and the responsibility—for using federally collected funds must be given to elected officials in these governments.

The need for remedying this situation is urgent. The time for reform is now.

Local freedom of action.—I propose a revenue sharing plan to give State and local governments the money they need to deliver the services that can best be performed by government closest to the people.

This is how the new "freedom of action" plan will work:

In the first full year of the plan, $16 billion will be directed to the States and localities, in a way that will enable them to decide as never before how that money will be spent.

Of this amount, $5 billion will be in the form of general revenue sharing, without restrictions. This will all be "new" money, without matching requirements and with the decision on how it is to be used exclusively a State and local matter.

The remaining $11 billion will be in the form of special revenue sharing, with the discretion on how it will be used within each of six broad subject areas strictly a State and local matter. These areas are:

—Urban community development,
—Rural community development,
—Education,
—Manpower training,
—Law enforcement, and
—Transportation.

The hobbling restrictions now on much of the Federal aid in these areas would be removed, along with matching requirements that presently force localities to spend their own matching money on low-priority projects for fear of "losing" available Federal aid.

To emphasize the importance of the special revenue sharing funds, the change from the present tightly restrictive categorical grants to special revenue sharing in the six broad areas will be accompanied by an increase of $709 million in the amounts budgeted for 1972 for Federal aid to States and localities. But even more important is the fact that these governments would have far greater freedom of action in deciding how money is to be spent within each of the six areas. For example, although the Federal Government would designate the total amount of special revenue sharing for education, the State or local area would decide how much is to be spent on new textbooks, new schools, equipment, or other matters of priority to it in the field of education.

In this way, both general and special revenue sharing will redirect the control of State and local decisions on $16.1 billion to the States and localities affected most by those decisions. This is about half of Federal Government aid, excluding public assistance grants, to States and communities—a historic and massive reversal of the flow of power in America.

BUDGET AUTHORITY PROPOSED FOR REVENUE SHARING PLAN, FIRST FULL YEAR

Description	Billions
General revenue sharing	$5.0
Special revenue sharing:
Urban community development	2.0
Rural community development	1.0
Education	3.0
Manpower training	2.0
Law enforcement	0.5
Transportation	2.6
Total	16.1

We must make provision at the outset of this freedom of action plan for both growing State and local needs and growing State and local capacity to manage their affairs.

The new funds for general revenue sharing will grow in years to come because they will be tied to the Federal personal income tax base. As that tax base expands, more unrestricted money will flow to States and localities.

To help State and local governments develop greater capacity to plan and manage their own affairs, I will send to the Congress a planning-management assistance plan, which will provide $100 million to help these governments make their own long-range plans and enhance their capability for the efficient use of their growing revenues.

In essence, this is what revenue sharing will do:

—for the individual taxpayer, it will provide a stronger voice in how his tax money is spent locally, new confidence in government that comes from more "citizen control," and the hope that, in some States and localities, taxes may be reduced, or that the rising cost of government can be met without raising taxes;

Revenue sharing and welfare reform are of a piece: the level of government best equipped to respond should respond in a way that raises standards and contributes to the sum of personal freedom and human dignity.

Executive Office of the President, Bureau of the Budget

RESTORING CONFIDENCE IN GOVERNMENT

In seeking ways to reform the federal system, I have paid particular attention to the ability of the executive branch of the Federal Government to produce the results intended by the Congress and the President.

In 1971, the Federal Government will employ almost 2,900,000 civilians, operate thousands of separate programs, and spend $212.8 billion. Through its tax laws, credit activities, grant programs, and in other ways, the Government affects millions of people and influences the disposition of many more billions of dollars than it controls directly.

Toward the end of the sixties, there was mounting evidence that our Government was so complex, clumsy, and unresponsive, that it was becoming unable to meet the needs and priorities of the people or to use efficiently the funds entrusted to it.

This must not be permitted in America.

We have already taken actions to improve the organization and management of the Federal Government and, thereby, make it more efficient and responsive.

But we must do more. The Federal Government is not organized properly to deal with the Nation's most significant problems in the domestic area. Programs that should be joined together to achieve common goals are fragmented among different departments and agencies, impairing the capacity of government to respond effectively to urgent national needs. Modernization of that structure will restore vigor to our federal system, permitting a constructive partnership among Federal, State, and local governments.

In the next few months, I shall propose sweeping legislation to help achieve these goals by merging seven existing departments and several independent agencies into four departments:

—a Department of Natural Resources,
—a Department of Human Resources,
—a Department of Community Development, and —a Department of Economic Development.

These new departments will match the domestic programs of the Federal Government with the objectives each is intended to fulfill:

—the balanced and constructive use and conservation of the land and other natural resources of the Nation;
—the development and well-being of individuals and families;
—the quality of urban and rural communities as places for people to work and live; and —the maintenance and strengthening of the American economy.

To continue the modernization of the Federal Government, I will also ask an extension of the President's reorganization authority. We must seek to expand current efforts to shift operating responsibility for Federal programs out of Washington and closer to the people these programs are designed to serve.

To fulfill its responsibilities, the Federal Government must attract, develop, and retain capable career executives. We must have a more effective manpower planning and utilization system. I shall propose legislation to establish a Federal Executive Service which will permit:

—more effective career executive search;
—flexibility in the allocation and assignment of available talent; and —strengthened executive development programs and policies.

By improving the organization and management of government, we will make it more responsive to the needs of the people and the new priorities of the Nation.

REFORMING THE BUDGET PROCESS

Reform of the budget process is long overdue. Fifty years have passed since the Federal budget system currently in use was adopted. The system was a major step forward in 1921. Because of congressional inaction, it has become a travesty a half-century later.

Enactment of appropriations 6 months or more after the start of the fiscal year they are supposed to cover is evidence of a major weakness. I have sent two budgets to the Congress. In each, I have had to formulate budget proposals for the year ahead without knowing what the Congress would provide in its action on the prior year's budget, which was transmitted 11 months earlier. Even now, as this message is being written, action on last year's appropriations request for one department has not been completed.

Administration Proposes Responsibility-Power Balance Through Revenue Sharing

I have, therefore, had to act on parts of the budget without knowing the totals that would result. This is an intolerable situation, but one that the Congress seems to accept as the normal way of doing business. It completes action on appropriation bills over a 10- to 12-month period without any goal or determination of the total expenditures that will result after the last bill is passed.

Excess in the number and detail of appropriations often diverts attention to minutiae. It also impairs the ability of agency heads to manage their agencies responsibly and economically.

The budget is our principal instrument for coordinated management of Federal programs and finances. Close cooperation between the executive and legislative branches is needed now to make the budget an efficient and effective instrument for this purpose. Therefore we must seek a more rational, orderly budget process. The people deserve one, and our Government, the largest fiscal unit in the free world, requires it.

Furthermore, Federal credit programs which the Congress has placed outside the budget—guaranteed and insured loans, or loans by federally sponsored enterprises—escape regular review by either the executive or the legislative branch. The evaluation of these extra-budgetary programs has not been fully consistent with budget items. Their effects on fiscal policy have not been rigorously included in the overall budget process. And their effects on overall debt management are not coordinated well with the overall public debt policy. For these reasons, I will propose legislation to enable these credit programs to be reviewed and coordinated along with other Federal programs.

Glossary of Key Terms in the Federal Budget

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Jan. 29—Following is a glossary of the important technical terms used in the Federal budget:

APPROPRIATIONS: The amount of money that Congress approves for any agency to spend or lend. The appropriations bills passed by Congress in any one year generally contain authority to spend some of the money in the same year and some in future years.

AUTHORIZATION: A law permitting a Government agency to spend a specified amount of money. Appropriation bills are the most common, but not the only form of authorization.

BUDGET AUTHORITY: The term used to cover all types of legal authorizations for the Government to disburse money, whether through spending or loans; also, the total amount of such authority.

CARRYOVER FUNDS: Money that an agency has already been legally authorized to obligate or spend but that has not yet been obligated or spent.

COMMITMENTS: Same as obligation.

EXPENDITURES: The amount of money that the Government or an agency expects actually to pay out over a given period of time. The term "expenditures" technically does not include money disbursed for loans, but the term is still sometimes used to cover lending as well as spending.

FEDERAL FUNDS: All the money available to the Government (from tax collections and borrowing) except that money, such as Social Security and gasoline taxes, which is legally earmarked for specified expenditures.

FISCAL YEAR: The year that the Government uses for bookkeeping purposes. It runs from July 1 through June 30, and the year used corresponds with the calendar year in which the fiscal year ends. Thus the fiscal year 1972 runs from July 1, 1971, through June 30, 1972.

FULL EMPLOYMENT BUDGET: A budget in which the estimated total Federal tax collections are not those actually expected but those that would be collected if the economy were operating with only 4 per cent unemployment, the so-called "full employment" figure.

FULL EMPLOYMENT RECEIPTS: The total tax collections that would be realized if the economy were operating with only 4 per cent unemployment and personal incomes and corporate profits to match.

LENDING AUTHORITY: Legal authorization, which must be enacted by Congress, for an agency to make commitments to lend.

NET LENDING: The amount by which the Government's (or an agency's) lending exceeds the repayments it receives on loans made earlier.

OBLIGATIONS: The actual commitments made by any Government agency to spend or lend money. Commitments can be made by signing contracts for purchase of materials, by approving loan applications, simply by putting someone on the payroll, and in other ways.

OUTLAYS: The term used to cover all types of Government disbursement of money, whether in spending or in loans.

PROGRAM AUTHORITY: The budget authority for a specific program.

PROGRAM LEVEL: The amount of money that an agency has obligated, or expects to obligate, itself to spend and lend in a specific year.

TRUST FUNDS: Funds that the Government keeps separate from its other money because the receipts of these funds are earmarked to finance specific expenditures. The main trust funds are the Social Security, railroad retirement, civil service retirement and highway construction trust funds.

TOWARD A FULL GENERATION OF PEACE

Our goal is a full generation of peace in which all nations can focus their energies on improving the lives of their citizens.

To achieve this, we must continue to work in close cooperation with our allies, move from confrontation to negotiation with those with whom we differ, and—together with our allies—maintain enough military strength to deter aggression. Sufficient and effective programs of military and economic assistance to help our friends help themselves are an integral part of our program.

National security.—This Nation's strategy for peace will—as it must—be based upon a position of military strength. The purpose of this strength is to prevent war; and, to this end, we will negotiate with those whose vital interests and policies conflict with our own.

We are pursuing negotiations on strategic arms limitations, on Vietnam, on Berlin, and on the Middle East. These negotiations are difficult and often slow, but we have the stamina and commitment necessary to proceed with patience and purpose.

As we carry on negotiations, we couple them with other efforts to achieve the same goal. The Vietnamization program is an example, and we are making good progress. By this spring, our authorized troop strength will have been cut approximately in half since the time I took office, and we will continue to bring American troops home.

Supporting these efforts, the military forces of this Nation and its allies will provide the armed might necessary to deter aggression or to deal with it effectively where necessary. We expect our allies to do more in their own behalf, and, in the spirit of the Nixon doctrine, many are taking steps in that direction. But we must also do our share. The kind of partnership we seek to forge works both ways. We have a vital interest in peace and stability abroad and we plan to maintain the capabilities necessary to protect that interest.

Our withdrawals from Vietnam and the change in our general purpose force planning and strategy permit a smaller force structure than in the past. At the same time, the preoccupation with Vietnam has limited our ability to meet some of our military needs elsewhere, particularly in NATO. We must be certain that our military forces are combat-ready and properly equipped to fulfill their role in our [illegible] In addition, [illegible] formidable Soviet nuclear and

This plan would remove the principal evils of the existing system by:

—setting national eligibility standards;
—balancing strong training and work requirements with equally strong training and work incentives;
—giving financial relief to the States; and —establishing a Federal floor under benefit payments for all needy families with children, including those with working fathers, for the first time.

Social security improvements.—I will propose a significant reform of the social security system, providing automatic adjustments for increases in the cost of living. Such an adjustment now calls for a 6% benefit, effective retroactively to January 1, 1971, to cover the cost of living increase since January 1, 1970. I will also propose increases in widows' pensions.

Beyond these basic reforms, I will seek to harmonize related income maintenance programs with the principles of our income strategy. This will include:

—reform of services provided to welfare recipients to encourage greater accountability and effectiveness in the use of funds, and to establish national standards for foster care, with new incentives for the adoption of handicapped children; and
—proposals to put railroad retirement funds on a financially sound basis.

Improving health care.—During the current session, I will send a message to the Congress that will set out a national health strategy for the seventies and propose significant changes in the Federal role in the Nation's system of health care.

This strategy will seek to expand preventive care, to train more doctors and other health personnel, and to achieve greater equity and efficiency in the delivery of health services. It will include a new health insurance program for all low-income families with children.

The budget reflects in a preliminary way the emphasis that this [illegible]

—reorganize the field operations of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission to make more effective efforts to halt discrimination in private employment;
—focus the activities of the Civil Service Commission to assure equal Federal employment opportunities for all our citizens, with special emphasis on opportunity for Spanish-surnamed Americans;
—serve 46 localities with conciliation assistance through the Community Relations Service;
—expand administration of the fair housing and equal opportunity laws to increase residential housing choices for all Americans; and —increase by 15% funds to agencies to assure nondiscrimination by recipients in their use of Federal assistance.

Education and manpower training.—The education and manpower training programs proposed in this budget reflect my determination to find better ways to carry out Federal programs. Special revenue sharing is proposed for both of these vital areas. I will also submit major reform proposals to:

—reform Federal aid programs for higher education to increase their effectiveness;
—direct more funds to students from lower income working families;
—establish a National Institute of Education for research and development; and —provide additional training opportunities and strong incentives under the Welfare Reform Act of 1971 for employable welfare recipients to undertake suitable employment or job training.

Research and development on social problems.—The Office of Economic Opportunity will emphasize its leadership role in research, development, and evaluation in social programs.

IMPROVING OUR ENVIRONMENT

The improvement and prudent use of our physical resources is vital

Housing.—The housing industry has already begun to lead our economic expansion. Fiscal and monetary actions taken in the past year have resulted in a significant easing of mortgage interest rates. Federal policy must help this industry meet the pent-up demand for housing.

The effectiveness of our housing programs will not be improved by merely continuing to increase Federal subsidies. The programs must be simplified and fitted into a rational framework. Inconsistencies must be removed, along with the obsolete rigidities in statutes that at times prevent programs from operating at all.

The administration will again propose legislation to carry out these badly needed reforms, which I urge the Congress to enact.

Community development.—I will also propose reform of the community development programs of the Department of Housing and Urban Development, and of certain economic development programs of the Departments of Agriculture and Commerce. Narrowly defined categorical grant programs in this field have frequently conflicted with local priorities and unnecessarily generated red tape.

With special urban and rural revenue sharing programs, we will permit localities to plan and carry out community development in accordance with their own needs.

Initial funding of the new urban program will begin at a level of $1 billion for the second half of 1972, upon enactment of the necessary legislation. An additional $2 billion appropriation is anticipated for 1973, when the program will be in effect for a full year. Rural development revenue sharing will be $1 billion in the first full year.

Science and technology.—Science and technology can make major contributions to the public by developing creative solutions to a wide range of national problems that will help us all enjoy a better life. I am proposing in this budget a substantial expansion in outlays for federally supported research and development.

While a large portion of this increase is needed to strengthen our defense capabilities I am also recommending substantial increases in civilian areas to:

—make greater use of our scientific and engineering capabilities and resources to cope with major national problems such as pollution, crime, health, transportation, and other environmental and social problems;
—strengthen research essential to the advancement of our technology and economic productivity; and —increase our investment in fundamental science which leads to the long-term progress of our society.

As an example of the concern of this administration for the use of science and technology in the public service, I am recommending that the budget for the National Science Foundation be increased from $506 million in 1971 to $622 million in 1972. A significant portion of these added funds will be directed to research on pressing national problems.

THE LONGER VIEW

Federal budget decisions must be made with an awareness of their influence on the economy and on resource allocation in the future as well as the present.

Too often in the past, consideration of objectives and priorities focused only on Federal spending. Only immediate issues, rather than longer term goals, were considered. And this fact was ignored: when we increase the priority of some programs, the relative priority assigned to others must be reduced. In short, the sum of the resources allocated to the various functions—such as health, education, defense—cannot exceed the total resources that we command.

Looking to the future, we find that resources likely to be available to the Nation grow more rapidly than the expenditures required by existing commitments. But our freedom to use these resources will shrink as we approach each future year and make financial or program commitments in the interim. Thus, the allocation of each year's resources is largely a reflection of our past priorities.

As we make choices this year, we will be determining the use of our available resources and expenditures in future years.

this strength is to prevent war; and, to this end, we will negotiate with those whose vital interests and policies conflict with our own.

We are pursuing negotiations on strategic arms limitations, on Vietnam, on Berlin, and on the Middle East. These negotiations are difficult and often slow, but we have the stamina and commitment necessary to proceed with patience and purpose.

As we carry on negotiations, we couple them with other efforts to achieve the same goal. The Vietnamization program is an example, and we are making good progress. By this spring, our authorized troop strength will have been cut approximately in half since the time I took office, and we will continue to bring American troops home.

Supporting these efforts, the military forces of this Nation and its allies will provide the armed might necessary to deter aggression or to deal with it effectively where necessary. We expect our allies to do more in their own behalf, and, in the spirit of the Nixon doctrine, many are taking steps in that direction. But we must also do our share. The kind of partnership we seek to forge works both ways. We have a vital interest in peace and stability abroad and we plan to maintain the capabilities necessary to protect that interest.

Our withdrawals from Vietnam and the change in our general purpose force planning and strategy permit a smaller force structure than in the past. At the same time, the preoccupation with Vietnam has limited our ability to meet some of our military needs elsewhere, particularly in NATO. We must be certain that our military forces are combat-ready and properly equipped to fulfill their role in our strategy for peace. In addition, we face formidable Soviet nuclear and conventional forces, including increased naval forces, and a further rise in the costs of our military equipment and personnel.

For these reasons, I am recommending an increase of $6 billion in budget authority for military and military assistance programs. This Nation has the will and the resources to meet its vital national security needs. At a time when we are urging our allies to do more and when our potential adversaries may seek military advantage, I cannot in good conscience recommend less.

We often think of military strength primarily in terms of equipment and massive organizations. While these are important, attracting and holding able citizens in the Armed Forces is the key to an effective and efficient military force. The service of Americans in uniform is worthy of respect, and I am dedicated to the goal of making all such service voluntary. This budget, and subsequent legislation which I will recommend to the Congress, will make significant progress toward ending reliance on the draft.

Foreign assistance.—Our present foreign assistance programs were established for a world that has long since changed. I will propose legislation to adapt them to the conditions of the 1970's.

We must clearly distinguish the varied purposes of foreign aid—the security of the United States and friendly nations, the long-term development of lower income countries, and humanitarian needs—and make possible a realistic assessment of our progress toward each. In 1972, our assistance programs will:

—promote a strong partnership among nations and a vigorous leadership role for multilateral development institutions; —recognize that other nations have a growing ability and responsibility to determine their own development priorities;
—continue security assistance at a higher level than in recent years in order to help friendly nations meet the responsibility for their own defense; and —improve coordination of our humanitarian assistance efforts.

These changes will carry out a major theme of U.S. foreign policy—less direct U.S. involvement in the affairs of other nations, less potential for friction and resentment, and a stable world order more conducive to lasting peace.

MEETING HUMAN NEEDS

The proposals that I submit today are a major step forward in the reform of our Nation's efforts to meet the needs of its 206 million citizens. They will introduce a new fairness into American life by providing:

—a basic income floor under every family with children in this Nation;
—health care to help make needed services possible for all of our people when and where such services are required; —better systems of support for education and manpower training; and
—continued progress in assuring the civil rights of all citizens, and in controlling crime.

Income strategy.—Last year was one of great promise for the long-term income security of American families. Some of that promise reached fruition in the reform of unemployment insurance and food stamp programs:

- Unemployment insurance was extended to 4.8 million additional Americans, including farmworkers and hospital workers, and special extended benefits were established to be triggered automatically by adverse economic conditions.
- Food stamp benefits were improved by establishing national eligibility standards, requiring family allotments large enough to purchase an adequate diet, providing free food stamps to the poorest recipients, and automatically raising benefits with increases in the cost of living.

However, much of that promise was left unrealized. As I have pointed out, in 1972 I will redouble my efforts to make essential and fundamental reforms in income maintenance programs. First, and foremost, I will seek:

- Basic welfare reform.—Last year I proposed that our archaic and demeaning welfare system be reformed. A landmark plan that would have accomplished this was approved by the House but did not come to a vote in the Senate.

  The urgency of the need for welfare reform grows with every passing day. I have already stressed the need for early enactment of the Welfare Reform Act of 1971 by the 92d Congress.

  [illegible] system, providing automatic adjustments for increases in the cost of living. Such an adjustment now calls for a 6% benefit, effective retroactively to January 1, 1971, to cover the cost of living increase since January 1, 1970. I will also propose increases in widows' pensions.

Beyond these basic reforms, I will seek to harmonize related income maintenance programs with the principles of our income strategy. This will include:

—reform of services provided to welfare recipients to encourage greater accountability and effectiveness in the use of funds, and to establish national standards for foster care, with new incentives for the adoption of handicapped children; and
—proposals to put railroad retirement funds on a financially sound basis.

Improving health care.—During the current session, I will send a message to the Congress that will set out a national health strategy for the seventies and propose significant changes in the Federal role in the Nation's system of health care.

This strategy will seek to expand preventive care, to train more doctors and other health personnel, and to achieve greater equity and efficiency in the delivery of health services. It will include a new health insurance program for all low-income families with children.

The budget reflects in a preliminary way the emphasis that this administration will place on health in 1971, with:

—an increase of $100 million to accelerate greatly the search for a means of preventing and curing cancer;
—a vigorous effort to find a cure for sickle cell anemia;
—a $95 million increase in Federal support for schools that train our Nation's health manpower; and —a rational policy of using Federal resources to help bring the rapid increase in medical care costs under control.

The budget also provides for:

—a substantial improvement in the quality of medical care provided to veterans with service-connected injuries;
—expansion of services for mothers and children, Indians and Alaska natives, and women who cannot afford family planning services;
—expanded programs to combat drug abuse and alcoholism;
—emphasis on assuring purity of foods and drugs; and —encouraging greater use of less costly services and facilities in delivering medical care.

Executive Office of the President, Bureau of the Budget

Community safety and crime prevention.—My commitment to the reform and revitalization of our system of criminal justice is supported by this budget. The budget proposes a 32% increase in outlays to improve law enforcement, to make our judicial system fairer and more efficient, and to raise the effectiveness of correction and rehabilitation. In this way, we will:

—step up the war on organized crime and the gambling operations that finance it;
—destroy major criminal systems that import and distribute narcotics and dangerous drugs;
—strengthen local law enforcement through the special revenue sharing fund for this purpose;
—continue the antihijacking campaign to protect the Nation's air travelers; —expand our correctional improvement programs to develop more innovative correctional institutions, and improve probation, parole, and other community-based services; and —develop, in cooperation with State and local governments, ways to provide more accurate information on law enforcement activities.

Guaranteeing civil rights.—The ideals of our Nation require that the civil rights of all citizens be respected, regardless of race, sex, religion, or national origin.

My budget for 1972 proposes to strengthen our efforts to eliminate discrimination in private as well as Federal employment, in activities supported by Federal assistance to State and local governments and other recipients, in education, in housing, and in other aspects of society.

We will take these specific steps to improve the lives of all our people:

—increase by more than 50% our efforts to prevent employment discrimination by Federal contractors and other private employers;
—increase nearly threefold the Federal assistance to school districts that are desegregating; [illegible] and
—increase by 15% funds to agencies to assure nondiscrimination by recipients in their use of Federal assistance.

Education and manpower training.—The education and manpower training programs proposed in this budget reflect my determination to find better ways to carry out Federal programs. Special revenue sharing is proposed for both of these vital areas. I will also submit major reform proposals to:

—reform Federal aid programs for higher education to increase their effectiveness;
—direct more funds to students from lower income working families;
—establish a National Institute of Education for research and development; and
—provide additional training opportunities and strong incentives under the Welfare Reform Act of 1971 for employable welfare recipients to undertake suitable employment or job training.

Research and development on social problems.—The Office of Economic Opportunity will emphasize its leadership role in research, development, and evaluation in social programs.

IMPROVING OUR ENVIRONMENT

The improvement and prudent use of our physical resources is vital to our Nation's prosperity and to the goal of helping all Americans enjoy a clean environment, adequate housing, and a better standard of living. In 1972, outlays to achieve these objectives will increase by $2.4 billion to $26.1 billion. The actions that I am proposing will:

—expand my administration's vigorous efforts to protect and enhance the quality of our environment and recreation resources;
—revitalize housing and community development programs; and —increase Federal research and development efforts.

Environmental quality.—The primary responsibility for protecting and enhancing the environment lies with State and local governments, industry, and the public, but the Federal Government must—and will—provide vigorous leadership.

During the past year, this administration moved forcefully to exercise that leadership:

- Major Federal pollution control and abatement activities were consolidated in a new Environmental Protection Agency;
- The Council on Environmental Quality was given a major role within the Executive Office of the President to advise on environmental problems and on national policies to deal with them;
- New legislation to strengthen national efforts for reducing pollution was proposed to the Congress; and
- Funds for major environmental quality programs were increased significantly.

Pollution control and abatement programs will get even greater attention in the 1972 budget. Outlays will be increased by $764 million. Budget authority will rise even more, by $1.3 billion. The higher amounts will provide for:

—doubling grants for municipal waste treatment facilities;
—curbing pollution from Federal facilities;
—expanding EPA pollution control operations, including implementation of new air quality and solid waste legislation; and —developing new pollution abatement techniques.

Legislation is again proposed to create the Environmental Financing Authority, which will assist communities that have difficulty in borrowing at reasonable rates to meet their share of the cost of water pollution control facilities.

I shall shortly propose, in a special message to the Congress, a series of further measures to control pollution and improve the quality of our environment.

Executive Office of the President, Bureau of the Budget

Recreation.—Greater opportunity for leisure is valued highly in America and, as a result, the demand for recreation facilities is growing. The 1972 budget proposes a substantial increase in grants to help State and local governments provide some of these facilities.

I am recommending that the Land and Water Conservation Fund be fully funded to provide:

—grants of $280 million to help States and localities meet local recreation needs; and —appropriations of $100 million for Federal acquisition to preserve nationally significant natural and historic areas.

I propose that the urban open space program be more than doubled, to $200 million, to provide more recreational areas in and near our cities.

Cultural activities.—I have again recommended that we double the appropriation for the National Foundation on the Arts and the Humanities, so that we can bring the benefits of these great cultural efforts to an increasing number of people throughout the country.

[illegible] of science and technology in the public service, I am recommending that the budget for the National Science Foundation be increased from $506 million in 1971 to $622 million in 1972. A significant portion of these added funds will be directed to research on pressing national problems.

THE LONGER VIEW

Federal budget decisions must be made with an awareness of their influence on the economy and on resource allocation in the future as well as the present.

Too often in the past, consideration of objectives and priorities focused only on Federal spending. Only immediate issues, rather than longer term goals, were considered. And this fact was ignored: when we increase the priority of some programs, the relative priority assigned to others must be reduced. In short, the sum of the resources allocated to the various functions—such as health, education, defense—cannot exceed the total resources that we command.

Looking to the future, we find that resources likely to be available to the Nation grow more rapidly than the expenditures required by existing commitments. But our freedom to use these resources will shrink as we approach each future year and make financial or program commitments in the interim. Thus, the allocation of each year's resources is largely a reflection of our past priorities.

As we make choices this year, we will be determining the use of our available resources and expenditures in future years.

The resource allocation questions that the Nation will answer—either explicitly or by default—are:

- Shall we increase the available margin by ending some existing commitments?
- Who should use the margin—the Federal Government, State and local governments, or private citizens?
- To what objectives should the available margin be applied?

In answering these questions, the Nation will be setting its priorities for the future.

My preferences are clear. One great objective of my administration is to increase the role of private citizens and State and local governments in allocating our national resources in accordance with individual and local needs. Another great objective is to set minimum standards to make certain that every American family in every locality is treated with a fairness that reflects the national conscience.

Ours is not a regimented economy, nor will it be. Yet, we cannot ignore the influence of the budget on the economy and on the use of our national resources in the present and in the future. To do so is to take the chance that government spending will preempt resources that should be left to be used by private citizens or State and local governments.

In the last few decades, the Federal Government, disturbingly, has taken over the determination of how too many of the Nation's resources will be allocated. In spite of the Federal Government's domination, resources have not been appropriately allocated to overall national needs. Instead, they have been allocated by a process in which small additions were usually made in existing programs, and a few new categorical grant programs were created each year. These new grants were generally aimed at alleviating some narrow problem—without reference to the Nation's real need in that general problem area.

I have in this budget proposed the outlines of a new process for allocating funds according to national priorities.

Instead of continuing "more of the same" to more than a hundred narrow categorical grant programs, I have proposed replacing them with six special revenue sharing programs designed to deal with major national problems. These are problems that have different characteristics in different parts of the country. With these special revenue sharing funds, State and local governments can set their priorities within the national objective, design a solution fitted to their particular needs, and solve their problems locally.

The general revenue sharing program provides unrestricted funds to State and local governments to achieve our Nation's top domestic priority—the creation of a system of government that is effective and responsive to the needs of all of the American people. General revenue sharing will allow State and local governments to overcome their immediate fiscal crises and to come to grips with those problems that concern their citizens most.

The revenue sharing programs which I have proposed result from shared goals, provide federally shared revenues, and involve shared Federal-State-local responsibility for solving America's most important problems. Our system of government must be one of shared goals—shared revenues—shared responsibilities.

CONCLUSION

The 1972 budget befits a strong, free, compassionate, and enlightened Nation.

- It reverses the trend of the past decade toward Federal domination of the Nation's decisions, and begins to make government more responsive to the will of the people.
- It recognizes that a strong defense is vital to all our objectives, most of all to the attainment of peace.
- It provides the resources needed to meet the Nation's commitments at home, with a new standard of fairness to the poor and sick.
- It accepts the principle that budget policy, together with monetary policy and the active cooperation of the private sector, must be used to help achieve full employment in peacetime with relative price stability.

This budget expresses our fiscal program for the New American Revolution—a peaceful revolution in which power will be turned back to the people—in which government at all levels will be refreshed, renewed, and made truly responsive. This can be a revolution as profound, as far-reaching, as exciting, as that first revolution almost 200 years ago.

'Revolution' Set Back

Revenue Sharing Dying, Nixon Aides Fear; They Hunt for Alternatives

2/12/71

By ALBERT R. HUNT
Staff Reporter of THE WALL STREET JOURNAL

WASHINGTON — Even as President Nixon starts selling his "Great American Revolution," some administration insiders fear its cornerstone, revenue-sharing, is dead.

Some officials who a few weeks ago were brimming with enthusiasm and confidence over revenue-sharing's prospects suddenly have become deeply pessimistic. "Very little has gone right in the past week or so," laments one of the plan's boosters.

They currently believe there's only a remote chance of winning congressional approval for the proposal to turn $5 billion a year over to states and localities with hardly any strings attached. The outlook for "special revenue-sharing," or switching about $11 billion of narrow categorical grants to broad block grants in six basic areas, is cloudier as the specifics of this plan won't be sent to Congress until next month.

Publicly, the administration will continue to champion its general revenue-sharing bill and some officials still hope for a dramatic break to turn the tide. But privately, some key revenue-sharing proponents concede the proposal is going nowhere, and already are looking for palatable alternatives.

Game Plan Stalls

From the start, the administration knew general revenue-sharing faced formidable obstacles in Congress. But the game plan was to mount a massive and united lobbying and public-relations effort by the administration, governors, mayors and prominent citizens that would overwhelm congressional opposition with a display of the program's popularity.

The drive stalled almost immediately. Some observers believe that what momentum there was, has switched to various alternatives being bandied about by revenue-sharing opponents, including a federal take-over of welfare, federal income-tax credits for taxes collected by states or a public-service jobs program.

The problems stem partly from even more formidable congressional opposition than was imagined, officials say. Immediately after the President unveiled the program it was sharply assailed by both Chairman Wilbur Mills (D., Ark.) of the House Ways and Means Committee and Rep. John Byrnes of Wisconsin, the committee's ranking Republican. Revenue-sharing planners never expected support from these two powerful Congressmen, who have long opposed the principle, but they had hoped their opposition would be publicly moderate, particularly after Mr. Nixon had held a special meeting with them.

Also, officials say, the expected strong support from state and local officials hasn't been forthcoming. No big city mayor, for instance, has embraced the President's proposal yet.

But the administration effort has had internal problems, too. Some observers assert the revenue-sharing campaign has been badly mishandled from the beginning. Some governors and mayors feel Vice President Spiro Agnew's role in rallying their backing has been counterproductive. And most revenue-sharing supporters were horrifed when the Vice President lashed out at Rep. Mills for opposing the plan.

Further, there's a wide belief that the confusion over how "special revenue-sharing" will work has cost the administration some much-needed early support. Many state and local officials apparently are waiting for specifics on the block grant plan before jumping on any revenue-sharing bandwagon.

The despair of revenue-sharing advocates emerged this week when the general revenue-sharing bill was introducd in the House and Senate. The administration was banking on getting more than half of both houses to sponsor the legislation in an effort to demonstrate strong bipartisan support. "It's imperative that we show Wilbur Mills he's thwarting the wishes of most of his colleagues," one Nixon strategist had explained.

But the administration could muster only 38 Senators and 138 Representatives as sponsors. More significantly, only five Democratic Senators, all Southerners, and eight Democratic House members, joined in. "A lot of Democrats are for revenue-sharing, but they're not going to be for President Nixon's revenue-sharing," says one administration aide.

Mills and Others Carried Thrust

Some administration officials believe potential liberal Democratic support for the program evaporated with the counterproposals offered almost immediately by Rep. Mills and others. According to this reasoning, if there had simply been opposition to revenue-sharing, the plan's backers could have paraded in a stream of state and local officials to relate their financial problems. "We would have been the good guys trying to help solve problems while the opponents would have been the villains," notes a revenue-sharing booster.

But this possibility was severely undercut when opponents started talking about alternatives that also would ease the financial burdens of local government. Congressional observers note that Mr. Mills' suggestion for the federal government to gradually assume most, or all, welfare costs is rapidly gaining support.

Revenue-sharing backers also realized they were in trouble earlier this week when 15 big-city mayors testified before a congressional committee in favor of a proposal by Sen. Jacob Javits (R., N.Y.) and Sen. Gaylord Nelson (D., Wis.) for a public service jobs program. "The mayors want money, and it looks now like they're turning to other possibilities that may seem to have a better chance," one government official observes.

This has embittered some architects of the Nixon plan, who note that the general revenue-sharing proposal was worked out with state eral income-tax credits for taxes collected by states or a public-service jobs program.

The problems stem partly from even more formidable congressional opposition than was imagined, officials say. Immediately after the President unveiled the program it was sharply assailed by both Chairman Wilbur Mills (D., Ark.) of the House Ways and Means Committee and Rep. John Byrnes of Wisconsin, the committee's ranking Republican. Revenue-sharing planners never expected support from these two powerful Congressmen, who have long opposed the principle, but they had hoped their opposition would be publicly moderate, particularly after Mr. Nixon had held a special meeting with them.

Also, officials say, the expected strong sup- had simply been opposition to revenue-sharing, the plan's backers could have paraded in a stream of state and local officials to relate their financial problems. "We would have been the good guys trying to help solve problems while the opponents would have been the villains," notes a revenue-sharing booster.

But this possibility was severely undercut when opponents started talking about alternatives that also would ease the financial burdens of local government. Congressional observers note that Mr. Mills' suggestion for the federal government to gradually assume most, or all, welfare costs is rapidly gaining support.

Revenue-sharing backers also realized they were in trouble earlier this week when 15 big-city mayors testified before a congressional committee in favor of a proposal by Sen. Jacob Javits (R., N.Y.) and Sen. Gaylord Nelson (D., Wis.) for a public service jobs program. "The mayors want money, and it looks now like they're turning to other possibilities that may seem to have a better chance," one government official observes.

This has embittered some architects of the Nixon plan, who note that the general revenue-sharing proposal was worked out with state and local groups and tailored to meet their desires. In return, mayors and governors were supposed to line up Democratic support on Capitol Hill. "I wish we'd taken charge of getting Democratic support ourselves," an administration official says.

Hope in Governors' Meeting

Others suggest, however, that these groups haven't abandoned the plan but just aren't very good at rallying congressional support. There's still some hope that pressure from state and local sources might pick up, particularly when the National Governors' Conference holds its midwinter session here later this month.

But there's considerable concern, even within the administration, that the plan has already taken on a strong political coloration, chiefly because of Vice President Agnew. "Many people are turned off by anything that has Agnew's imprint on it," one Republican governor frets.

Some ranking administration aides observe that the Vice President wasn't helping things much when he told Southern members of the National Association of Counties that their constituents "probably have more confidence in you than they do" in Mr. Mills. Mr. Agnew also questioned the powerful Ways and Means chairman's "right to sit up in the District of Columbia and judge from afar."

"He did everything but call Wilbur a radic-lib," forlornly notes one Nixon official. "It looks like revenue-sharing may be a casualty of the 'rehabilitate Spiro-campaign'."

Confusion over the "special revenue-sharing" has created difficulties, too. A spokesman for the National League of Cities and the U.S. Conference of Mayors notes this block-grant plan "is what confused the issue." Most big-city mayors, the spokesman adds, "want to make sure no games are being played," especially when the administration has been chary about spending funds currently available for urban aid. Even some administration officials wonder if special revenue-sharing wasn't mentioned prematurely, since many of the important details still are undecided.

Connally's Role Assessed

The political skills of new Treasury Secretary John Connally have been widely regarded as a major plus for revenue-sharing's prospects, and in a Wednesday night speech he proclaimed his staunch support for the proposal. But doubts have cropped up about whether he will get very involved in its behalf. "Right after he takes over," one Treasury official remarks, "I don't think the Secretary should risk all his prestige and credit by really pushing a bill that seems doomed."

This mood has forced some administration planners to ponder the possible alternatives that would provide the same money to stimulate the economy.

One suggestion that will meet stiff resistance from the administration is that the federal government pick up all the welfare tab, as this might kill the President's family-assistance program. A bill similar to the public-service-jobs proposal was vetoed by President Nixon last year, and George P. Shultz, director of the Office of Management and Budget, recently indicated the administration still is cool to this idea.

A federal income-tax credit for part of a taxpayer's state and maybe local tax payments, as suggested by Rep. Byrnes, is more appealing to some administration insiders, though they quickly emphasize they feel it's inferior to revenue-sharing.

A recurring fear among revenue-sharing backers is that any battle between competing schemes to help state and local governments could doom all proposals. "Different people lining up behind different proposals might mean that in the end we'll get nothing," Gov. Francis W. Sargent of Massachusetts says.

THE ABM is expected to cost anywhere from $50 billion to estimates as high as $400 billion if started and completed. The power of the committee chairman's clout is best illustrated by the concentration of defense contracts and establishments in states with chairmen of key committees. The American taxpayer will naturally be expected to pay the bill. And just to make sure the taxpayers pay the price, the Pentagon's $4 million lobby program has a brainwash campaign to sell the public into believing the ABM is absolutely necessary.

THE REAL CLOUT in Congress comes from the two appropriations committees in the House and Senate. They can make or break a program, and they can pile on government obligations for pet schemes. Last year Congress voted $156 billino worth of spending, including $80 billion for defense. Military and defense related spending for fiscal 1968 came to 66 percent of the entire federal budget. The $156 billion includes all funds appropriated by Congress during calendar 1968—$103 billion was for outright defense, veterans and administration of the national debt (75 percent of which was war created).

THE elusive RECORD OF LYNDON JOHNSON

by AL TOFFLER

Washington

EVER SINCE the Soviets shot their first Sputnik skyward, a tall, cagy Texan has been orbiting in the headlines. Texas' Lyndon Johnson, Senate Democratic leader, with his preparedness hearings and now with his leadership in the politics of recession, has been dominating Washington, a circumstance made possible by the clumsy vacillation of the White House.

Johnson's emergence is being watched by experienced Washington hands who know how intense his yearning for the Presidency grows at times. A high-octane operator who is reputed to be one of the two or three most powerful men in the nation's capital, Johnson is now playing statesman with the unemployment issue as he did during the Sputnik furor he helped engineer. This game requires, as Johnson sees it, a minimum of Trumanesque hell-raising and a maximum of conciliatory appeals for "bipartisanship."

"There may be some," he told the Senate recently, "who look upon the current situation as an 'issue' . . . The only issue is how soon we can get rid of the issue, so the working men and women of America can be employed on productive jobs." Yet Johnson is far too canny a politician to believe his own oratory. Unemployment is a high, wide, and handsome issue, made to order for an election year. With the Democrats sniffing November victory even before the slump began, the recession comes almost as the coup de grace. Moreover, this enhances Democratic chances in the 1960 Presidential race.

What aggravates the situation is that the White House, as usual, is diddling in a corner, trying to juggle statistics to make the mass unemployment look no worse than during Democratic recessions. This stupid defensiveness opens a void into which stalks the decisive figure of Johnson, a sort of President-by-analogy, with plans for public works and stepped-up government spending.

For Johnson this must be an appetite-whetter. It is always frustrating for a man of action to see a hesitating bumbler lose control of the ship. He longs to put his hands firmly on the tiller. In moments like these, Johnson's gnawing, restless ambition deepens. His intuitive grasp of political reality tells him that his chances of capturing the 1960 bid are slender. Yet stranger things have happened, and Johnson knows, too, that when he puts his mind to something he usually wheedles, threatens, cajoles, or bargains until he gets it. Phenomenal resources of energy and a boundless power drive help him to do so.

Johnson has the reputation for being the most successful cloakroom compromiser that Washington has seen in a generation. As Senator Pat McNamara, Michigan Democrat, puts it: "He trades apples for orchards all day long." Behind this facility lies his power as majority leader. In this post, Johnson not only commands great influence on the committee assignments his colleagues get, but he also stands like a traffic cop directing the flow of legislation across the floor of the Senate. By subtle tactics and skillful timing he is in a position to help or hinder bills in which others may have profound stakes. He is in a position to use the club along with the carrot.

Johnson's personal persuasiveness is legendary. His vitality is so attractive that amateur psychologists under the Capitol dome say that Johnson radiates a subtle kind of sexuality that nobody talks about but of which many are aware. For example, part of the stock Johnson treatment is what some call the "laying on of the hands." Johnson's long arms wrap themselves about even the most casual conversation partner. Reporters laugh and call it "the massage." Johnson himself calls it the "pressing of the flesh." Pretty soon the object of all this tactile attention, who is also bathed in a warm sea of flattery or promises, thinks that Johnson is a great guy.

On the other hand, Johnson can storm petulantly at both colleagues and newsmen when his dignity is ruffled. On one occasion, when Pennsylvania Democrat Joe Clark, while presiding in the Senate, failed to recognize Johnson quickly enough, the Texas Senator charged out of the chamber muttering angrily.

Johnson's tactics have been discussed often. But Johnson's beliefs remain wrapped in mists of his own making. Johnson makes a conscious art of non-commitment. When Fortune asked him to state his opinions on a list of economic questions, he sent the magazine a brisk letter maintaining that for a Senator, and especially a leader, to commit himself in advance on issues weakens his effectiveness on the floor. George Reedy, the former United Press man who is Johnson's staff egghead, strawboss, and press agent, holds forth at great length about this theory of non-commitment, contrasting it with what he calls disdainfully, "The Senator of Position." According to this theory, the less said about legislation in advance, the better. There is no question that premature commitment to specific language makes it difficult for a Senator to navigate effectively once the refined amendments begin to flow. On the other hand, Americans traditionally like to know where the people they elect stand, and it is possible to commit oneself to principle without necessarily committing oneself to language.

AL TOFFLER, formerly feature editor of Labor's Daily, is a Washington free lancer who has written for Coronet, The Nation, The New Republic, Frontier, and The Christian Science Monitor.

Despite all efforts to the contrary, a Senator's beliefs, and at least his voting record, begin to show after a while. This is true of Johnson, too. But it is a contradictory, elusive record which provides slippery ammunition for both his supporters and his critics among American liberals.

His admirers are legion. They include Senate liberals who insist that the Texan is really a liberal fellow, despite all the talk about his deals with the South. To prop up their argument they insist that Johnson's innermost instincts are liberal ones, formed during his youth in the New Deal period. His first fight was for public power and rural electrification in Texas, a fact of which Johnson is inordinately proud. He supported Franklin D. Roosevelt's plan to pack the Supreme Court when seasoned backers of F.D.R. had fled with tails between their legs. During his tenure as Texas state director of the National Youth Administration, Johnson demonstrated elementary human decency by giving Negro and Mexican youth a fair—though segregated—shake.

Moreover, continue Johnson's backers, Johnson has been staunch for small business, militant in the fight against Administration farm policies, internationalist in foreign affairs, anti-tariff on trade issues. In the McCarthy fight, they admit, he remained very quiet. But he delivered a unanimous Democratic vote for McCarthy's censure, no mean feat.

In addition, they go on, Johnson gives incoming young liberal Senators a break when it comes to good committee assignments. And, as majority leader, they say, he has been effective in preventing the Senate from bogging down in fruitless palaver. He keeps the legislative mill grinding. More important, they add, Johnson is the bridge that holds Northern Democrats and Southern Democrats in the same party. Without Johnson, the implication is, the party would fall apart in the Senate.

Finally, they say, should Johnson ever be elected to the White House, he would be freed of regional pressures from Texas and would thereby be able to assert his own liberal instincts more fully.

However, there is another side to the story. This side is also presented by liberal Senators, but always in private, for the simple reason that Johnson's cudgel is large and well-knotted.

The chief general criticism is that Johnson is an opportunist, a kind of Democratic Richard Nixon, young, able, Western-born, aggressive, ambitious, and adept at demagogy. The record of Johnson's opportunism can be traced only in broad outline. He is a careful craftsman who leaves few tell-tale traces behind. When he switches position it is done with a magnificent grace that dazzles the observer.

Thus, last summer, before Sputnik, Johnson led his Democratic troops in an economy assault that cut back defense appropriations. But last winter it was Johnson who in his own moderate fashion led the attack on the Administration for alleged penny-pinching in the face of Soviet advances. It was all done so neatly that only the Republican National Committee knew what had happened to it.

Or take the issue of public power. Johnson has been a leading proponent of public power since his first days in Congress. He has close ties with, and makes dextrous use of, the National Rural Electric Cooperative Association and similar groups. Yet it was Johnson who wrote a new low chapter in Senate demagogy with his slashing smear campaign against the reconfirmation of Leland Olds to the Federal Power Commission in 1949. For the benefit of the oil and gas interests, Johnson went after Olds in the grand old manner of McCarthy—but before McCarthy patented it.

The result of this hatcheting was the murder of the liberal majority on the Federal Power Commission. It was Olds who had held together a quavery 3-2 vote on the Commission in favor of public power and the public interest. With Olds gone, the Commission became energetically hostile to public power and obsequiously friendly to big oil and utility interests, a tendency the Eisenhower Administration merely reinforced.

This service in behalf of the oil industry was only one of many. Within weeks after he returned to the Senate from the convalescence following his 1955 heart attack, Johnson put in a 10-hour stint on the floor in a successful effort to pilot the natural gas gouge bill to victory. It was only a Presidential veto that killed the bill later on. Johnson also worked to prevent a thorough investigation of the lobbying that led to the sensational attempt by the gas lobby to bribe Senator Francis Case, South Dakota Republican.

In all fairness to Johnson, however, it should be pointed out that he has not always been rewarded for his efforts in behalf of big oil. In Texas, oil men have a choice between Shivers-type candidates and Johnson. Also, Johnson's efforts have not been entirely consistent. In 1953 Johnson voted with the liberals against the Tidelands oil giveaway. More recently there has been interesting unpublished speculation about Johnson's role in the fiasco that led to the demise of the gas bill this year.

Insiders know that Johnson had in his possession a copy of the now-famous Porter letter several days before its exposure in the Washington Post. This was the crude letter in which Texas Republican boss H. J. Porter called on oil men to put up cash for his party in view of the efforts of House G.O.P. Leader Joe Martin in their behalf. The Washington Post sent Ed Folliard, one of its crack reporters, to Houston to cover the story, and it printed the letter in full. The result was a furor which killed the bill for this session. It was a two-way coup for Johnson: the G.O.P. was embarrassed; and, since the bill's chances were killed by the revelation, Johnson was relieved of the necessity of supporting it again this year.

It must be added that while Johnson has done his duty in defense of the gas lobby time and again, it has never been a particularly cheerful chore. Support of the lobby costs him dearly in reputation outside the oil and gas producing states. If this interpretation of what happened is correct, and the signs all point that way, it would support the view that Johnson is seriously eying the 1960 nomination and wants to minimize his oil ties.

These links have never been fully explored. His liberal backers insist that the real oil money opposes Johnson in Texas when the chips are down. There is one source of support, however, upon which Johnson can count. This is the gigantic non-union contracting firm of Brown & Root, a company which also owns oil pipelines and some producing wells.

Johnson has been intimate with George Brown, partner in the firm, for many years. It was on his way to Brown's lush Virginia estate that Johnson was stricken with his heart attack in July, 1955. Brown & Root, distributing its largesse deviously, has been a heavy campaign backer of Johnson. He in turn has done the company no harm in Washington where its biggest contracts are written.

Brown & Root is, incidentally, one of the largest anti-union hold-outs in the construction industry. Johnson, despite his New Deal record on other matters, never could wax enthusiastic about unions. In 1948, during his second bid for the Senate seat he now holds, Johnson mounted a massive oratorical offensive against organized labor. He did this without reference to principle, but because his chief opponent, Coke Stevenson, had won the endorsement of the Texas AFL. That the AFL should have supported anyone as politically neanderthal as Stevenson is understandable only to those who knew the AFL before the merger. At any rate, the Texas CIO, despite Johnson's blasts, stuck with him because, as one former official put it, "At least Johnson believed in the federal government."

Johnson accepted the votes that the CIO got him. Since he won by only 87 votes in the entire state it might be said that the CIO elected him. But he stumped the state declaring his passionate belief in Taft-Hartley and demanding that Stevenson do likewise.

Since then Johnson's record on labor has been ambiguous. According to a compilation of voting records by the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education, Johnson had, by 1956, voted against labor three times and for it only twice on the five roll call votes selected as most crucial to unionism.

One of these votes was against a minimum wage increase to 75 cents an hour. Another was in favor of an amendment urging President Truman to use Taft-Hartley against striking steelworkers. A third was a vote against giving the Secretary of Labor, rather than local authorities, the right to fix minimum wages on interstate highway construction. This measure was of direct importance to building trades unions who knew that locally established rates would almost always be lower than those set by the federal government. It was also of direct interest to contractors—like Brown and Root.

More recently, in 1954, Johnson voted in favor of the big corporation farmers and against the interests of labor and agricultural workers when he backed a bill authorizing Uncle Sam to recruit cheap Mexican labor for farm factories.

On the other hand, it must be appreciated that Johnson is not "anti-labor" in the same sense as so many of his Southern colleagues. His recent performance in helping liberals head off the Knowland anti-labor amendments, and a similar role he played in the Taft-Hartley amendment fight in 1954, help balance the record somewhat.

Labor lobbyists and leadership have remained, on the whole, skeptical of Johnson. It is interesting, however, to note that recently George Meany, president of the AFL-CIO, spent some time discussing labor legislation with Johnson. The crusty ex-plumber is reported to have been "seduced" by the Texan's amazingly effective charm and his political assurances. The meeting dispelled some of Meany's tough-minded aloofness toward Johnson.

Johnson consistently opposed civil rights legislation until last summer when he brought about the dilution of the bipartisan civil rights bill. Now Johnson takes credit for passing the measure. His liberal admirers say that had Johnson not worked out a compromise, the Southerners would have filibustered and no law would have been written. Anti-Johnson liberals deny this, saying that the Southerners wouldn't have resorted to filibuster for fear that they would be licked anyway, and that the act would have increased the likelihood of a change in the Senate rules. Liberals of both parties have fought desperately to change the rules in order to weaken the filibuster weapon used so effectively by the South's extremists. Johnson has consistently opposed these efforts.

There are few civil rights votes on public record, for the simple reason that civil rights seldom reaches the Senate floor. But in one recorded vote in 1950, Johnson voted for an amendment put in by Richard Russell of Georgia. It would have expressly permitted the armed forces to maintain Jim Crow in the ranks.

One Negro view of Johnson comes from Clarence Mitchell, the astute legislative representative of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People: "Senator Johnson is a skilled manipulator, but the framework of his action comes out of Dick Russell's workshop." Whether that comment is true or not, Johnson is very close to Russell. Russell gave Johnson the votes he needed to win the post of Democratic leader in 1951. In 1952 Johnson supported Russell's bid for the Democratic Presidential nomination. Johnson also runs the Senate in a fashion which has done no violence to continued Southern control of its centers of power.

Johnson's job as majority leader is to keep both wings of the party working together. This he does eminently well. But what this "accommodation" does is to dilute the Democratic Party's liberal program, not merely on civil rights but on any number of other issues as well. The result is that on election day the voter is hard pressed to differentiate Democrats from Republicans on the basis of issues.

Working with the Southerners, chipping off a few liberals here and there, and acting closely in concert with the G.O.P., Johnson has helped create a deep, perilous vortex in the center which leaves stubborn liberals isolated and ineffective, while sucking the unwary liberal into its waves. Liberals know this and complain among themselves. The Democratic National Committee knows it, too, and grumbles.

Even liberals who are eager to cover Johnson with public praise gripe privately about his lone-wolf refusal to caucus or to consult them, and his arrogance which demands that the floor be instantly relinquished whenever he wishes to speak. They complain, but they do nothing. They feel that they need Johnson and their Southern colleagues; they are not ready for any realignment which would oust the Southerners from the party. Particularly with Democratic chances for 1960 looking brighter, no one wants to rock the boat too vigorously.

Finally, some liberals apply another test to Johnson, that homily about liberalism beginning at home. For one of the things which has made Johnson a great many enemies (and enemies who are strategically located) has been his shortsighted opposition to the development of a truly liberal Democratic Party in Texas. Lone Star Democrats have been split for a generation. Today, however, for the first time, a liberal nucleus of some substance is developing in their midst. It calls itself DOT—Democrats of Texas. DOT gets its chief impetus from organized labor, young energetic intellectuals, and from the Negro and Mexican communities.

In a showdown fight against ultrarightist Allan Shivers in 1956, Johnson won control of the state party machinery. He promptly used it to stifle DOT influence. At the same time he declared an amnesty for ex-Shivercrats, who have been voting Republican in Presidential elections, while marching under the Democratic banner. Some Shivers backers turned up prominently on the Johnson for President Committee that arranged his favorite son candidacy in 1956. The result has been to surround, isolate, and weaken the DOTs.

Moreover, Johnson must view with some apprehension the rising fortunes of Texas' new Senator, Ralph Yarborough. Yarborough is the first Texas Senator to owe a good deal of his success to the state's burgeoning labor movement. He has many friends among the DOTs.

Johnson perhaps senses that Yarborough's victory marks the end of an era in Texas politics. The state has been undergoing subtle, but profound, changes. For example, between 1939 and 1953, according to the best estimates, union membership in Texas multiplied 240 per cent. The AFL-CIO's latest figures place union membership in Texas at 335,000 in 1953. It has grown substantially since then, too, as labor has followed the influx of the new petrochemical and aircraft plants. Moreover, it has not been the old line building trade unions (who have it in them to endorse a Coke Stevenson), but the Oil, Chemical, and Atomic Workers and the United Auto Workers who have made the significant gains. These are unions steeped in the militant traditions of the CIO. Both have been actively breaking down anti-Negro job discrimination.

Organization, urbanization, and other changes are all brought into focus by a small but angry and courageous weekly paper supported by the DOT. The Texas Observer has not only kept Johnson and state officials jumping with its alert coverage of the state political scene, but has been outspokenly liberal on such hot issues as civil rights and McCarthyism.

The march of industrialization across Texas may force Johnson to re-evaluate his role in state politics and may open the door to a more liberal stance in Washington. This tendency could be reinforced by a solid liberal stance in the elections this fall. If the Senate's liberal contingent is augmented enough, it will help offset the Southerners, and either permit —or compel—Lyndon to shift ground.

The Big Dilemma: Conscience or Votes

Should a legislator always use his own best judgment? Or should he let himself be swayed by the best judgment of the voters back home?

By WILLIAM BENTON

SHOULD a legislator compromise his principles in order to be a successful politician? How far should he go in order to be elected? Is it enough to be right most of the time, but to yield, on occasion, to the predilections or even the prejudices of his constituents?

Many people have asked me about the dilemma implicit in these questions which has puzzled students of politics since representative government began. But, paradoxically, I have found that legislators themselves are much less puzzled—and not because they are morally insensitive. The problems they actually confront, either as candidates or as lawmakers, are rarely black-and-white issues of conscience. Almost always they are questions of prudence and judgment—the height of a tariff or a subsidy, the size of a budget item, or, more particularly, the best tactics for advancing a particular cause in the face of opposition from colleagues or from constituents at home.

Nevertheless, the classic dilemma has a new relevance. Issues of civil and human rights—for example, segregation—tend to fall in the category of conscience, and these are critically important today. We had a dramatic example last November in the write-in, paste-in blitz that unseated Representative Brooks Hayes in the Little Rock district because his record, his campaign and his conscience had classified him as a "moderate" on race issues.

It has been said that I was myself defeated in 1952 on an issue of conscience because I had insisted on denouncing Senator McCarthy and on demanding his expulsion from the Senate. The parallel is valid only in that I was willing, on principle, to take publicly a position that seemed politically dangerous at the time. As it turned out, I lost because 1952 was an Eisenhower year, not on the McCarthy issue, and I ran well ahead of the national ticket.

IN the corridors of the Capitol in Washington one hears it said occasionally that if a Congressman votes "right" 95 per cent of the time—that is, in accordance with his own best judgment—he can afford to be "wrong" on 5 per cent of his votes—that is, against his own judgment or conscience—in seeking to serve some particular end, including his re-election. (He is supposed to console himself that his defeated opponent would doubtless have done worse.) The same formula has been said to apply to a campaign in which the candidate is forced to take controversial stands.

Is this attitude justifiable? Can such "wrong" votes be defended?

I invited some of my former colleagues to share in this discussion. They tend to focus on the question, should a legislator, once elected, compromise as a matter of practical politics in order to push necessary legislation through? They see this as closely intertwined with the question, should a legislator compromise his principles in order to be elected?

None of these colleagues will openly admit that a principle should ever be abandoned, under any circumstances. Almost all would agree with the formulation of Prof. T. V. Smith, the philosopher-politician, who wrote: "A politician is a man who can compromise an issue without compromising himself, and who can in a pinch give an issue away without giving himself away."

Two thoughtful Republicans who have just retired—voluntarily—after distinguished careers in Congress come to different conclusions about the issue of conscience and compromise as applied to segregation. I have worked intimately with both. They are men of high principle. Senator Ralph Flanders of Vermont, who seemingly does not want to see Governor Faubus in the Senate, writes me:

"There is a saying to the effect that 'a Senator's first duty is to get re-elected.' This sounds a bit cynical, but there is a real vein of truth in it.

"If I were a Southern Senator and were facing the Little Rock situation, I would be strongly moved to avoid the extreme segregationist position, but would also avoid crusading for anti-segregation. I would join the moderates so far as seemed safe and hope for re-election, knowing that if I were defeated in the primaries my place would be taken by a rabid segregationist."

REPRESENTATIVE John Vorys of Ohio, who was the intellectual leader of the Republican minority interested in foreign policy in the House, says:

"I am extremely cautious about calling political decisions moral issues. On the other hand, I think that Congressmen and Senators are expendable rather than indispensable, and no Congressman or Senator should cast a vote he knows is wrong in order to be re-elected. It makes no difference whether the wrongness is on a moral, legal, economic or other issue.

"As Edmund Burke said: 'Your representative owes you, not his industry only, but his judgment; and he betrays instead of serving you, if he sacrifices it to your opinion.'

"Taking the example you mention, I think that if a Southern Senator is opposed morally to segregation he should vote his convictions and take his medicine. For one thing, he might be surprised to find how many people admire that kind of courage."

TWO of my correspondents cited the vote on the 1957 Civil Rights Bill and reached opposite conclusions. Senator Wayne Morse of Oregon, never one to shirk an unpopular cause and one of the most courageous men in the history of the Senate, argues that the politician's "dilemma" can usually be resolved if he works hard enough at informing his constituents. He writes:

"Too often and too readily politicians—when they vote against something they know is in the public interest—fall back upon (Continued on Page 83)

WILLIAM BENTON, a former U. S. Senator from Connecticut and Assistant Secretary of State, publishes the Encyclopaedia Britannica.

The Big Dilemma: Conscience or Votes

the excuse that 'I know it is right but people don't understand it.'

"What these politicians don't understand themselves is that it is part of their function in representative government to get the facts across to the people so they will understand. Instead, they become panhandlers for votes. We have many in public life who are afraid or unwilling to be defeated. Winning is their only goal, not true public service."

Senator Morse is certain he could not have been re-elected to the Senate in 1956, in the face of the Eisenhower landslide, if public opinion, which had opposed some of his votes when he cast them, had not later swung over to his view.

HAVING battled for civil rights throughout his career, he was nevertheless the only Senator outside the South who voted against the 1957 Civil Rights Bill. Here is an example of his individuality and his spirit. He says:

"Of course, I recognize the need for compromise in legislation. But the Civil Rights Bill of 1957 was passed because members of Congress wanted to be on record as having voted for something with that title; their bill actually compromised the civil rights guarantee of the Fourteenth Amendment. I do not accept the view that such a compromise of principle is ever justified. When a principle is compromised it is destroyed and all that is left is a statement of expediency.

"'But,' says the doubter, 'when does the legislator know when he is dealing with a matter of principle?' The answer is that his brains and conscience always tell him so, and he always knows when he has compromised a principle."

Senator Clinton P. Anderson of New Mexico, one of the most able, experienced and humble men in public life, reached a different conclusion about the same measure:

"The House had passed a Civil Rights Bill. It came to the Senate. The Judiciary Committee was bypassed and the bill came at once to the Senate floor. Some Senators were determined to try to pass a Civil Rights Bill with the strongest possible language and the most drastic provisions. They could have adopted all their amendments, perhaps, but could never have passed the bill * * *.

"I became disturbed at the situation because I wanted a Civil Rights bill passed. * * * I talked it over with Senator Lyndon Johnson and out of our conference came my approach to Senator George Aiken of Vermont, whom I greatly admire. We developed an amendment and were subsequently joined in it by a third co-sponsor, Senator Francis Case of South Dakota.

That amendment to Section III was not pleasing to those who preferred defeat of the bill to any compromise, but it was adopted by the Senate and paved the way for adoption of another amendment previously offered by Senator O'Mahoney and others. When the amending process was finished the Southerners realized they could not successfully filibuster against the revised bill * * *.

"Maybe the Civil Rights bill was not everything it ought to be; maybe it will need to be amended in view of Little Rock and other spots. That will, however, come easier because of abuses which followed the passage of civil rights legislation by the Eighty-fifth Congress and will be much easier than would have been the case had the no-compromise faction had its way and no bill resulted."

SENATOR Johnson of Texas, widely admired as Majority Leader of the Senate, writes me:

"The real issue is not whether a man should compromise—because I do not believe in compromising a principle—but whether he should insist on asserting his position aggressively on every single issue that comes along.

"Everybody is fond of quoting Clausewitz' dictum, 'War is politics carried on by other means.' The reverse is also true that politics is war carried on by other means. When it is viewed in that perspective the answer becomes somewhat more readily apparent. It would be ridiculous to say that a captain of infantry out on a scouting expedition should charge into a regiment that he meets unexpectedly.

"Nobody would expect him to do so. In fact, he would be court-martialed if he did anything other than the sensible thing, which is to fall back to the main body of troops and gather his forces so he can be ready for action when action is feasible.

"The captain of infantry has not 'compromised' his position because he refused to sacrifice his men or his followers by fighting under impossible circumstances. Similarly, I do not think that the political leader should be accused of 'compromising' his position because he too refused to fight on impossible terrain. It is essential for a political leader to be able to pick the terrain and the time upon which he will give battle."

Representative John W. McCormack of Massachusetts, majority leader of the House of Representatives, whose job requires him to steer legislation through the House, seems to agree with Senator Johnson. He writes:

"As between partial progress and no progress, it seems to me that the constructive mind takes the road of progress.

"I never place myself mentally in the position of compromising principle and conscience. But there are times when I might harmonize differences in order to make progress, or maintain unity, and then start the journey from there.

"The extent of 'compromise' or 'harmonization' depends upon the circumstances of each case, the atmosphere, the strength of the opposition, as well as the support for a measure, and other factors. But sometimes there can be no 'compromise' or 'harmonization,' such as the extension of the Selective Service Act in 1941, three months before Pearl Harbor."

SENATOR John F. Kennedy's book, "Profiles in Courage," written in 1955, consists of case studies of political courage in the Senate going back to 1803. He finds that it sometimes takes courage to compromise. He writes in his book:

"We shall need compromises in the days ahead, to be sure. But these will, or should be, compromises of issues, not of principles. We can resolve the clash of interests without conceding our ideals* * *. Compromise need not mean cowardice. Indeed, it is frequently the compromisers and conciliators who are faced with the severest tests of political courage as they oppose the extremist views of their constituents. It was because Daniel Webster conscientiously favored compromise in 1850 that he earned a condemnation unsurpassed in the annals of political history."

PRESSURE—In advancing worthy causes legislators must at times face the danger of opposition by their constituents. Here, voters from home wait in the Senate lobby to buttonhole their Senators.

Senator Kennedy now writes me:

"I think even more now than I did in 1955 that the politician faces this dilemma more than the member of any other professional or occupational group. Others face different moral choices perhaps, wondering when a compromise is one of accommodation or one of principle—but no one else has to do it in such a glare of publicity, or in such an irretrievable manner, on a permanent record, and with only the answer of an 'aye' or 'nay' to choose between."

This last point is of high importance. There are no footnotes in the voting record; each vote is the monosyllable "aye" or "nay." The business executive seldom faces such dilemmas. His mistakes tend to be buried in the over-all record of profit and loss—or at least they can be explained in his annual report.

IN my opinion, these statements by Senators and Congressmen (and others like them I have not quoted) deserve the highest respect, even from those who may disagree.

Further, my own experience as a legislator persuades me that Congressmen are fully justified in intermingling the question of campaign policies and tactics with the question of legislative policies and tactics. The two are inseparable. The great majority of legislators who are elected in a given year in the United States—Federal, state and local—have been re-elected. From the moment they were first sworn in as legislators they were running for re-election and this is seldom out of their thoughts. Each must run on his legislative record; he knows his next opponent will scrutinize that record with a magnifying glass.

FINALLY, the issues that actually confront a legislator are rarely simple. When a major bill reaches the floor it is a long, complex document. If a Congressman or Senator disagrees with some aspect of it, he may seek to amend that aspect from the floor—but it is usually an exercise in futility. Generally he must cast his "aye" or "nay" on its net value.

In my judgment it is often impossible for a legislator clearly to separate considerations of prudence from moral principles. Indeed, he must frequently fall back on prudence if he is to advance his moral principles.

One of America's greatest social thinkers, the late Prof. Robert Redfield, discussing progress toward race equality, pointed out that a right and moral action may in some circumstances defeat or postpone the social end it is intended to serve.

Abraham Lincoln never doubted that slavery was wrong. Yet in December, 1860, a month after his election as President, he offered to guarantee to the Southern states, in perpetuity, their right to a slave system, providing they agreed there should be no extension of slavery in the territories. Lincoln hoped that this offer might avert civil war; and undoubtedly he hoped also that the slave system would in time dissolve and disappear.

The danger in the argument for prudence is that, for those of us who are less than Lincolns, it can be an excuse for weakness. Like most other men, politicians too often underestimate the long-range values of boldness and stubbornness in defense of an ideal. Gandhi can be an example as well as Lincoln. Gandhi won because he was bold and stubborn and preferred jail to compromise.

I am so impressed with this danger that I cannot personally agree with any argument to the effect that a legislator need be morally right only 95 per cent of the time—and can thus give away the other 5 per cent even if it involves an affront to his conscience.

ULTIMATELY, each member of Congress must make his own decision each time a matter of principle arises—to compromise or not to compromise, to stand fast or to yield ground in the belief that his action will help achieve the desired final goal. His burden is that he must make the decision again and again and again—and not just once in a moment of emotional intensity—for there may be some 200 "aye" or "nay" roll-call votes each year plus hundreds of votes in committee or elsewhere, any one of which may involve a "moral choice."

A whole nation will be watching. But for each member of Congress the decisions, whatever they may be, must be taken in the solitude of heart and mind and conscience.

How Strings Are Pulled to Aid Strauss

By DREW PEARSON

WASHINGTON — The big push to confirm Adm. Lewis Strauss as secretary of commerce has been directed backstage by George Humphrey, erstwhile secretary of the Treasury and crown prince of the M. A. Hanna industrial empire.

Drew Pearson

Just as Humphrey's economic ideas had a way of becoming President Eisenhower's economic policies, the men he favors seem to find their way into key administrative posts in the Eisenhower economy. It was his recommendation that led to Strauss' appointment as secretary of commerce. Here is what Humphrey is doing now to push the appointment through the Senate:

Humphrey pulled the strings that sent Ohio's ex-Sen. John Bricker scurrying back to the Senate last week to urge Strauss' confirmation.

Through Bricker, Humphrey arranged to make the confirmation fight a party issue. A party-line statement was drawn up by Bricker's former aide, John McElroy, who had stayed on in Washington as GOP counsel to the Senate Interstate Commerce Committee. Big Andy Schoeppel of Kansas, senior Republican on the committee, read the statement into the record. Then Sen. Thruston Morton of Kentucky, GOP national chairman, and Sen. Hugh Scott of Pennsylvania, former GOP national chairman, cracked the party whip over Republican colleagues.

A power in Ohio politics, Humphrey brought political pressure on Ohio's Democratic Sen. Frank Lausche to vote for Strauss.

Apple Outing

HUMPHREY arranged for Strauss to be invited by Virginia's apple-cheeked Sen. Harry Byrd as the only outsider to his annual apple outing for Southern senators. Byrd's son, Harry Jr., just happens to hold a lucrative job in one of Humphrey's subsidiary companies, Industrial Rayon.

Finally, Humphrey has brought hidden economic pressure on both senators and newspapers to support Strauss.

It remains to be seen, however, whether the powerful Republican business leader can stampede the Democratic majority leader into confirming his man.

Strauss' government staff has also been lobbying behind the scenes for his confirmation. Joe Fox, a former Washington Star editor now working for the Commerce Department, showed up in the Star's editorial rooms to urge the Star to support Strauss. Others have been telephoning influential friends and slipping around to see senators.

Rights Issue

SENATE GOP Leader Everett Dirksen has received word from the White House to oppose Democratic Leader Lyndon Johnson's proposed conciliation service for settling civil rights problems. Many moderates considered it an important step toward better race relations.

The House Appropriations Committee voted 13 to 7 behind closed doors against a manpower freeze on the Army and Marine Corps. By a two-vote margin, the committee also approved a $200 million modernization program for the Army. At the same time, the committee turned down, 10 to 8, the Navy's request for funds to build a supercarrier.

The tobacco industry has been jolted by the sobering news that cigaret-smoking Arthur Godfrey and cigar-smoking Gen. Nate Twining have lung cancer. Philip Morris has already abandoned all advertising claims that cigarets are cancer free. Instead it is building a $3,000,000 research laboratory in Richmond, Va., to remove cancer-causing tars from cigarets. Meanwhile, the company will produce "ventilated" cigarets, punched full of holes above the filter tip, to cut down on tars.

Russia's Prime Minister Mikoyan and Deputy Premier Koslov both want to come to New York to open the Soviet trade Fair June 30. Mikoyan seems to like the USA, wants to come back. But Koslov says he hasn't been here and it's his turn. . . . U. S. Ambassador Thompson has warned that Dictator Khrushchev does not have the Presidium's full support for summit negotiations. He must come back from the summit conference with a political victory or face serious opposition inside the Kremlin.

Congress IUD Digest, Spring, 1961

Curbing the 'Willful Six'

Immediately following the close of the 1960 post-convention session of Congress, a group of Northern and Western Democrats made it clear that they would lead the fight to "curb the power of the 'willful six.' "

The liberal bloc—known as the Democratic Study Group—was leveling a not-so-new attack upon the House Rules Committee because of the committee's ability to frustrate social welfare legislation.

Main target of the attack—"the willful six"—was a conservative coalition of four Republicans and two Democrats with the necessary votes to obtain a tie on the 12-man committee and thereby pigeonhole proposed bills slated for House action.

Under Congressional operating procedure, the Rules Committee has earned its title as the "Third House." Conceived as a traffic cop that would control the flow of legislation to the floor, the Committee has instead operated as a handmade tool whereby a small conservative minority can throttle the will of the majority.

Any proposed legislation that does not meet the approval of Representative Howard W. Smith (D., Va.), the Committee's chairman, stands little chance of coming to a House vote. An ardent supporter of states' rights, Smith vigorously opposes federal aid programs, civil rights, and all welfare measures that remind him of the New or Fair Deals.

Colleagues on the Committee who shared Smith's views were: William Colmer (D., Miss.), GOP Representatives Leo E. Allen (Ill.), Clarence Brown (Ohio), B. Carroll Reece (Tenn.), and Hamer Budge (Ida.). Since these five, plus Smith, made up half the Committee, the remaining six members—all Democrats—found it impossible to overcome a bill-burying tie vote.

Budge has since been defeated, being replaced by Ralph Harding, a youthful Democrat. Allen did not choose to run for reelection. Both Budge and Allen are certain, however, to be replaced on the Rules Committee by two other highly conservative Republicans in the upcoming 87th Congress.

The results of the election reinforced the conservative coalition that has dominated the House of Representatives. This may well be interpreted by Smith and other Southerners as a signal for an even harder position in refusing to report out liberal and welfare legislation.

But Smith is anything but a fool. He knows that he is confronted with an Administration that has a serious stake in achieving a positive legislative record. While liberal ranks have been reduced, Smith knows that Northern Democrats will rally to the Kennedy Administration's call.

Aware of the strategic power of his position and sensitive to cries of rebellion, Smith has usually made sure that at least a minimum of welfare proposals reach the House floor. He will, if necessary, vote to report out some bills in order to show token willingness to cooperate with Democratic Congressional leaders.

Smith knows that should he overstep his role, a new Congress, with the cooperation of the Democratic leadership, could strip him of his virtual veto power and thus deprive him of his authority. It was for this reason and probably no other that during the 86th Congress the Rules Committee finally reported out a civil rights bill.

As a longtime representative of the South, the Rules Committee chairman would be the first to admit that a handful of Congressmen and Senators in key positions can control the ultimate form of most Capitol Hill legislation.

A former Virginia circuit court judge before his election to Congress in 1931, the 77-year old Smith has carefully avoided an open fight with the Democratic Party. While sabotaging the liberal wing of his party at every opportunity, he has never admitted to any GOP allegiance. He will, for example, condemn the Democratic Party platform every four years, but has never publicly advocated election of the Republican national ticket.

Sat on Hands

Instead, in 1952 and 1956, he sat on his hands and refused to endorse Stevenson. His action, coupled with the similar tactics of Senator Harry F. Byrd, threw Virginia to President Eisenhower in both years, but Smith was never accused of an open bolt. In 1960, Smith and Byrd again refused to endorse the Democratic Party candidates.

The "Judge" may violently oppose the Democratic ticket and its platform, but an outright switch to the GOP would be disastrous for himself and for the "Southern cause." It would mean not only the loss of his Rules Committee chairmanship, it would also mean—if other Dixiecrat legislators took the same action—the end of the present seniority system that gives the Southern Democrats their Congressional power.

Senator James Eastland (D., Miss.) stressed this point during the 1960 Presidential campaign in a statewide Mississippi television appearance financed from his own pocket.

Waving a handful of papers that he identified as civil rights bills, Eastland said: "They're all dead because we've got legislative positions to do something about them. If I were to bolt the Democratic Party I would be removed as chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee." He warned that "the South would collapse like a house of cards" were it ever to lose its pre-eminence in any Democratic Congress.

Facts of Life

Last October, as Vice-Presidential Candidate Lyndon Johnson whistle-stopped through the heart of Dixieland, reporters noted that after brief conferences with the Senate Majority leader the party's political leaders openly supported the national ticket.

The reporters found it reasonable to assume that Johnson was citing "the political facts of life" and threatening Congressional upheaval if the Dixiecrats didn't voice at least half-hearted endorsement of the national ticket. Since Democratic control of the 87th Congress was accepted by the "pros" long before election, Johnson's warning fell on sensitive ears and the great majority of Southern political leaders stepped into line.

Usually able to avoid outright conflict, the Dixiecrats may well have overreached themselves during the last half of the 86th Congress. In the session that ended prior to the national conventions, the Rules Committee successfully blocked both school construction and housing legislation. These two measures—labeled "must" bills by the Democratic leadership—never reached the floor of the House despite indications that both proposals would have received the necessary votes for passage.

During the Democratic convention, the problem created by the Rules Committee received special attention in the party's platform.

Angered by "Judge" Smith's ability to detour the Democratic program, the platform drafters included a section that advocated action "at the beginning of the 87th Congress to improve Congressional procedures so that majority rule prevails . . . without being blocked by a minority in either house."

If the liberal wing of the Democratic Party was determined to take remedial action before the special session of the 86th Congress, its determination was greatly strengthened during the abortive August session. Acting as though it had never heard of the Kennedy-Johnson program, the Rules Committee was instrumental in seeing that no social legislation was adopted.

Bottled-Up

School construction, housing, minimum wage, liberalization of construction worker picketing restrictions, and health care for the aged legislation urged by the Democratic Party candidates all were either weakened beyond recognition or simply bottled up by the Rules Committee's conservative coalition.

Liberal Democrats made no attempt to blame the special session's failure solely on the Republicans. The Democratic Study Group bluntly held the "willful six" to be "largely responsible for the collapse of Senator Kennedy's legislative program" and members of the Group promised to conduct an all-out battle to curb the Rules Committee during the next Congress.

One of the Democratic Study Group's members—Representative Gerald T. Flynn (Wisc.)—publicly attacked the Rules Committee during a radio interview. A freshman Congressman, Flynn—since defeated—charged that the Rules Committee "is blocking new ideas, blocking new programs, blocking legislation in the interests of the people."

Acknowledging the possibility of retaliation for his public criticism of Congressional procedure, Flynn declared that "many members of Congress are fearful. . . . They are afraid to stand up in a battle with leadership and demand a change. . . . They are afraid of their committee appointments, their advancements, and so forth. . . ."

He added that "the people who elected me sent me down here to fight. . . . I am going to see that those rules are changed and the members of that committee . . . have to answer to the American people."

Flynn's attack brought immediate repercussions. GOP Rules Committee member Clarence Brown told Chairman Smith that he was "incensed" at the broadcast and suggested that the "Judge" obtain a transcript of the program.

A few days later, taking advantage of a large audience on the House floor, Smith defended the committee record and chastised the freshman Representative from Wisconsin. He asserted that "90 percent of [my] committee hearings result in rules being granted clearing bills for floor action."

In an answering statement, Flynn pointed out that "it may be that only 10 percent of the bills coming before the Rules Committee are denied a hearing on the floor . . . but it is in this 10 percent area that the important bills affecting the public and the people of this country lie." Flynn refused to apologize for his radio remarks and reiterated his intention to work to curb the Committee's power.

While liberal Democrats often have attacked the Rules Committee in the past, they have seldom been able to translate their frustration into effective action. Striving for Democratic harmony, the party's leadership has given the liberals verbal assurances, but has failed to follow through with effective action.

At the start of the 86th Congress in January 1959, the Democratic Study Group, numbering some 100 Representatives, attempted to amend the Rules Committee procedures, only to be blocked by Speaker Sam Rayburn.

The Speaker quelled the would-be rebellion by assuring the liberals that "legislation which has been duly considered and reported by legislative committees will be brought before the House for consideration within a reasonable period of time."

Rayburn's position is reported to have changed as a result of the Rules Committee actions during the special session. The Wall Street Journal claimed that following a futile conference on housing legislation at the end of August, Rayburn "pounded his fist on his desk . . . and angrily asserted, 'I'll never let the Rules Committee get away from my control again.' "

Leadership Anger

The Journal's report was substantiated by a story in the Christian Science Monitor that found Rayburn "privately vowing to curb the Rules Committee" and Senate Majority Leader Johnson "red-hot and angry" over the way the Committee turned the special session "into a shambles."

Senator Kennedy is known to favor a change in the Rules Committee. Following a pre-election meeting with Kennedy, Representative Lee Metcalf (D., Mont.), leader of the Democratic Study Group, said that Kennedy had agreed to support the drive to revamp the Committee. According to Metcalf, Kennedy recognized that liberal legislation called for in the party platform could be enacted only if the Committee's roadblocks were overcome.

Vice-President Richard M. Nixon, despite his attempts to portray himself as a staunch believer in social welfare legislation, went on record in opposition to Rules Committee changes, reflecting the real GOP position. Speaking in Richmond, Va., during the campaign, Nixon promised that he would fight all efforts to curtail the Committee's power. He pointed out that during previous efforts to change the Committee's procedure, he had consistently voted to maintain the present structure and rules.

The Rules Committee has not always existed as it does today. At the turn of the century, it was actually more dictatorial. As Speaker, "Uncle Joe" Cannon served as Committee chairman and handpicked his fellow-members.

In 1910, the late Senator George Norris (R., Neb.), then a House member, led a successful revolt against what he called "Cannonism." As a result, the size of the Committee was limited to 12 members, the Speaker was excluded, and members were elected by the full House—usually after being selected by respective party caucuses.

Roosevelt "Purge"

During Roosevelt's first term, and following his famed "100 days," the President ran into increasing opposition from the Rules Committee. Under the chairmanship of Representative Basil O'Connor (D., N.Y.), a coalition pigeonholed the first minimum wage bill for over a year.

Instead of attempting to revise the House rule, Roosevelt decided to set an example by "purging" O'Connor from Congress. In the 1938 elections, O'Connor was defeated, although every one of the other "purge" attempts failed.

The next attempt to change the Committee came in 1945 when the LaFollette-Monroney Committee on Reorganization of Congress recommended that a limit be placed on the time that the Committee could bottle up legislation. Representative Christian Herter (R., Mass.), now Secretary of State, led the unsuccessful fight to change the rules.

Four years later, the Democratic 81st Congress, voting in recognition of Harry S. Truman's surprise election victory, adopted a 21-day rule by a 275-143 margin. Under this rule, the House could call any bill to the floor after it had been held by the Rules Committee for three full weeks.

In the next Congress, however, the threat of fair employment practices legislation was strong enough to repeal the 21-day rule. The vote to repeal was identical with the vote for original passage—275-143.

The next attempt to revise the Rules Committee came in 1957 when the then Representative Eugene McCarthy (D., Minn.) handed a petition signed by 80 Congressmen to the Democratic leadership. The petition urged adoption of a more "progressive program" and necessary changes in House procedure. It was this manifesto that led to the creation of the Democratic Study Group.

With the Rules Committee basically unchanged since 1910, the House has only two remedies for prying legislation away from the conservative coalition. Although both of these procedures have been used successfully in the past, they require overwhelming House approval instead of a simple majority action.

One method—known as "Calendar Wednesday"—requires consent of the Speaker and usually a number of other committee chairmen. Since the seniority system has placed Southern Democrats in many of these chairmanships, consent is often difficult to obtain.

Under "Calendar Wednesday," the Speaker may call upon chairmen to report any bills passed by their committees directly to the House floor. The committees are called alphabetically, so that an Education and Labor Committee bill, for example, that has been bottled up by the Rules Committee, cannot be reported if Agriculture, Appropriations, Armed Services, Banking and Currency, or District of Columbia committees do not pass.

"Judge" Smith, who makes the final determination on the progress of bills stemming from these other committees, can often "pass the word" and block floor action. In the example cited above, Smith can usually find a willing ally among such chairmen as Harold Cooley (N.C.), Carl Vinson

To make matters even more difficult, a committee desiring to report out a bill also must have the cooperation of its chairman. Last year, the Education and Labor Committee could not utilize the "Calendar Wednesday" device for a minimum wage bill because its chairman—Graham Barden (N.C.)—opposed the measure. Barden refused to call a committee meeting when his fellow-members sought to instruct him to follow a majority vote.

Because of its procedural problems, "Calendar Wednesday" has never been used successfully on civil rights, but it was utilized—during the last part of the regular session of the 86th Congress—to obtain a vote and passage of depressed area legislation.

The Discharge Petition

The other way to bypass the Rules Committee is through the discharge petition. Under this system, 219 Congressmen must sign a petition before any bill can be brought to the floor.

Last year, a discharge petition was used to pry an education bill from the Rules Committee. When Smith realized that the petition would obtain the necessary signatures he reported out a bill, but when the measure was passed by the House, Smith refused to send it to a conference committee that would have compromised differences with a Senate proposal.

The problems of obtaining the necessary signatures on a discharge petition were best illustrated during the fight to obtain self-government for the District of Columbia. Proponents of the so-called "Home Rule" bill were able to get 215 Representatives to sign a petition at one time or another, but at the high point of their drive at least nine of the signers had withdrawn.

The Washington Post and Times Herald quoted four of those who had withdrawn their names as admitting that they had yielded to pressure. They had been told bluntly, they said, that removal of their names from the petition would speed up the progress of pet measures that they had introduced. Such pet bills usually deal with the reclamation and flood control projects considered politically important.

Faced with the practical aspects of power politics as they operate on Capitol Hill, liberal Democrats are convinced that only a change in the Rules Committee will permit passage of majority supported social legislation.

While these Democrats have not yet determined whether they will seek to change the make-up of the Rules Committee or simply to revise the Committee's procedure, they have indicated that a fight will be waged on the opening day of Congress in 1962.

Whether such a fight can be waged successfully may be determined by the actions of Speaker

Sam Rayburn, as well as the personal intervention of President-elect Kennedy. Rayburn has again pledged that he will push forward the Kennedy welfare legislative program. In the ultimate, this will probably require changes in the Rules Committee or in House procedures.

Plans formulated before the November election were predicated upon the assumption that liberal strength would not be cut. But liberals are still expected to call for the election of Rules Committee members to replace the time-honored tradition of permitting members to continue from session to session without formal vote.

Colmer Replacement?

Major purpose of this strategy would be to replace Representative Colmer—a Democratic member of the "willful six"—with a more liberal Representative. The objection to Colmer would be based not on his Committee votes, but on the ground that he deserted the party by indicating sympathy for the independent elector plan introduced by Mississippi Governor Ross Barnett.

This proposal—to handle the Rules Committee problem in the Democratic caucus—has the added advantage of sidestepping the required full House approval needed to change the Committee's numerical structure or its operating procedure. Such a maneuver would make it impossible for the Southern Democrats to count upon their usual support from Republicans.

Three other suggestions for overcoming the Rules Committee roadblock also are being considered. One would add a thirteenth member to the Committee, with the Democrats naming nine members and the GOP four, instead of the present eight-to-four ratio. By adding a liberal member, Smith's "willful six" would fall short of the necessary votes needed to kill legislation.

The second suggestion would be simply to change the rules so that a tie vote would be considered as favorable action, permitting bills to go to the floor. Like the previous proposal, this plan would neutralize the present power of the conservative coalition.

The third suggestion is to revise the 21-day rule that existed during the 81st Congress.

Changing the Committee's procedure, however, does not overcome the basic trouble—the lack of representation afforded various Congressional groups. Normally, members have been picked by naming those with long seniority. Since these Congressmen usually are advanced in years and represent "safe" districts or one-party states, they often lose touch with the will of the majority.

Of the Rules Committee members of the 86th Congress, for example, four were from the South and one from the border state of Tennessee. The addition of one vote—Clarence Brown of Ohio—gave this group almost complete control over the House despite a vast majority of Congressmen representing Northern, Western, and border states.

During the past few sessions of Congress, opening day has signalled a Senate fight to modify its filibuster rule. This coming January, the filibuster battle may be waged again, but it may have to share headlines with a long overdue fight in the House to replace antiquated parliamentary procedure with a truly democratic process.

The effect of driving poverty from the face of this nation would be tremendous—better health for us all, less crime and delinquency, more purchasing power for our goods, higher tax revenues, more sightly cities, and a shining standard of decency and dignity for all the world to see.—John F. Kennedy

It is very clear that the heaviest burden is being carried by those whose income is solely from wages and salaries. Income from dividends receives the benefit of a special tax credit and income from capital gains is treated even more favorably. Only a fraction of wage and salary income goes unreported on tax returns, while a much larger proportion of dividend, interest, and self-employment income escapes taxation.—AFL-CIO President George Meany

A Quiet Texan Takes Over House Appropriations Panel

BY ARLEN J. LARGE

WASHINGTON—The death of Rep. Clarence Cannon, the tough old economizer of the House, may make life a bit more placid for battle-scarred budget officers in the Executive Branch. But his absence isn't likely to open any floodgate of Congressional spending; the Federal purse strings are still gripped jealously by less famous men of almost equal power and influence.

As chairman of the House Appropriations Committee, the 85-year-old Missourian spent nearly two decades trying to outfox money-seekers in the White House and Congress alike. Mr. Cannon's colleagues, who referred to him simply as the Old Man, were fascinated and often angered by his search for new budget-cutting techniques. If outvoted, he might reorganize his 50-man committee in search of a stronger economy combination; last year, he played hob with Uncle Sam's ledgers just by encouraging a general appropriations slowdown.

"He never changed since I've been here," says a Democratic House leader with a tone of admiration. "He was always ready to tell anyone where to go from the President on down."

A Different Personality

Seniority now puts a much different personality into the Old Man's chair at the Appropriations Committee's big E-shaped table. George Mahon, a tall, 63-year-old Texan, is known in the House as a hard-working expert on the defense budget. Quiet-spoken and polite, Mr. Mahon is likely to work more in harness with the official House leadership and attempt less tinkering with Congress' complex appropriations machinery.

Even if he wanted to, however, Mr. Mahon would find it difficult to push significantly up or down the trend of Federal spending. For all his economy fervor, Chairman Cannon himself could never really dent the enormous power of his subcommittee chairmen, who control each Federal agency's budget and strongly influence Executive Branch policy as well. The names of such lawmakers as John Rooney of New York, Albert Thomas of Texas, John Fogarty of Rhode Island and Vaughan Gary of Virginia may not be household words, but in the nation's capital they are feared and famous men.

Their power is inherent in the way Congress handles the President's annual budget requests. The full House Appropriations Committee doesn't consider the budget as a whole, but splits it into bits and pieces for assignment to the 12 largely autonomous subcommittees. Each group prepares an appropriations bill for the agencies it supervises. As the House takes up each bill separately, the originating subcommittee members dominate debate on the floor. Later, they negotiate the final version of the bill with the Senate, which serves mainly as a court of appeals for Executive agencies and usually raises House figures, after that body has acted.

As chairman since 1949 of the 12-man subcommittee which handles defense appropriations, Mr. Mahon is well aware of the policymaking role that's played by lawmakers who ride herd on an agency's finances. Mr. Mahon has been giving Navy admirals an annual lecture on the importance of new weapons against Russian submarines. Such badgering, which sometimes has been accompanied by extra money, has helped encourage the Navy to upgrade its anti-sub effort and appoint a three-star admiral to oversee it.

Chairman Cannon often complained the piecemeal handling of the budget of the nearly sovereign subcommittees dulls the economy axe. But tradition and the highly individualistic personalities of the subcommittee barons also have an important influence on the annual budget wrangles.

For example, there's the proud tradition of relative non-partisanship and togetherness. Once a subcommittee agrees on a budget figure for its agency, all of its members—Democrats and Republicans alike—usually unite to prevent cuts or additions by outsiders. Mr. Cannon himself would fight a spending proposal vigorously at the subcommittee level (he was an ex-officio member of all 12 panels) but tradition required him to rally around and vote for it if the item reached the House floor.

By the time a Congressman has accumulated enough seniority to chair his own subcommittee, he's apt to develop attitudes that defy conventional "liberal" or "conservative" classification. With his rich Brooklyn accent, Rep. John Rooney may seem the very archetype of a big-city Northern liberal, and he scores pitifully low on the scorecard for conservatism kept by the Americans for Constitutional Action.

Yet Mr. Rooney is death on bureaucrats he suspects of costly empire-building. Here is Mr. Rooney belaboring Admiral Arnold Karo, director of the Coast and Geodetic Survey, for wanting too much money in the new budget:

Mr. Rooney: "You were not very much impressed with what went on here last year, then. I do not think we cut you enough."

Admiral Karo: "You cut my heart out."

Mississippi's Jamie Whitten, in contrast, ranks much higher on the ACA's conservative scorecard. But Agriculture Department witnesses tend to receive gentle treatment from him, and he refuses to permit such Administration-recommended economies as halving funds for the soil-building agricultural conservation program.

A veteran subcommittee chairman often develops over the years a close working relationship with career officials in the Executive Branch. Virginia's Vaughan Gary, who on occasion has taken hard whacks at the Treasury's budget, nevertheless produced long faces among his victims by announcing his retirement from Congress at the end of this year. "I'll be sorry to see him leave," says a Treasury official. "He knows our problems."

Foundation of Influence

A subcommittee chairman's knowledge of "his" agency's activity is the foundation for his influence and prestige in the House. Not all lawmakers agree with Otto Passman's vigorous annual chopping of the foreign aid appropriation, but the Louisianan rarely loses a floor fight. "Otto is blindly prejudiced against foreign aid," says a colleague, "but he knows more about the program than any other member of the House. That's why the House usually goes along with him."

Mr. Passman's foreign aid appropriation bill is one of the few money measures yet to be completed by the House this year. Thus, Mr. Mahon won't have a chance to take command of the full appropriations cycle until next session; some clues to his direction of the full committee may emerge in January when subcommittee vacancies are filled.

And, assuming his constant re-election, it may be some years before Mr. Mahon develops his own techniques for piloting his strong-willed band of subcommittee chiefs. Tough as this job is, however, Mr. Mahon won't have to approach them with the humble respect employed by supplicating bureaucrats each year.

The story is told of a greenhorn New Frontiersman in the Commerce Department who came back from his first grilling by Rep. Rooney's group. "They didn't even listen to what I tried to tell them," the shaken ex-businessman wailed to a veteran Government career assistant.

The oldtimer gave him this advice for future use: "Don't volunteer anything. Don't try to snow them. Just say 'Yes, sir,' and 'No, sir.' "

Taxpayers L Senate leader

NAL, FRIDAY, JUNE 5, 1964

WASHINGTON—Every day, five minutes before the Senate meets, Mike Mansfield of Montana pushes his thin frame through the Senate's big, swinging doors and strides down the stair-step center aisle to the Majority Leader's front-row chair. Sometimes he'll brush off the seat with the black leather folder he invariably carries. "Want to take over?" he'll ask one in a group of waiting newsmen.

Mike Mansfield smiles when he asks an outsider to take over but he means to be taken half seriously. He is not entirely comfortable with the job of leading the warring Senate Democrats. Sometimes he wants to be simply a Senator from Montana, with time enough to compose learned speeches about foreign policy and little to worry about except beef imports or the shortage of silver dollars.

The desire to be less important than he is makes Mike Mansfield unusual among the capital's big-time politicians. He dislikes publicity, refuses to promote himself and willingly gives up authority that should be his. He is the kind of man who feels a bit self-conscious in a chauffeured limousine (a perquisite of his office) and he's reticent about accepting the honorary degrees universities bestow on success.

For all these humble qualities, Mr. Mansfield is widely admired. But, mostly in private, he is also being criticized for his willingness to let loose the strands of power that Majority Leader Lyndon Johnson pulled together and bequeathed to him in 1961.

Certain liberal Democrats, in particular, want him to drive the Senate hard, to pounce on obstructionists, to flail the Republicans and in general to set the place crackling with fervor for the Democratic Administration.

"Be a leader!" Connecticut's Sen. Dodd once demanded of him. Others complain that he lets the Senate meander aimlessly; that he allows his friend the Minority Leader, Sen. Dirksen of Illinois, to set the legislative pace; and that, compared to what it was when LBJ occupied it, the Majority Leader's post has become a cipher.

Unfair Comparison

Yet it's unfair to compare the results of Mr. Mansfield's benign, accommodating reign with the hectic, suprise-filled years of Lyndon Johnson's Senate leadership. A major difference: Because Republicans controlled the Executive branch and Dwight Eisenhower did not sketch new legislative frontiers in every direction, LBJ was his own master, going so far as to set Democratic goals in a Congressional State of the Union message. But Mr. Mansfield's performance is measured against what a Democratic President wants.

Thus comparisons are somewhat beside the point. But Sen. Mansfield clearly could do more to expedite the public business and promote the President's program. He could apply pressure by criticism. He needn't have consumed two months by bringing in the Senate at 10 a.m. for the civil rights marathon and then, eschewing late-night sessions, letting it adjourn early (the morning sessions blocked most committee meetings).

He could, moreover, dangle prized committee assignments. He could hustle through the pet bills of legislators who cooperate while refusing to schedule those sponsored by members who don't. He could leak nasty stories about the uncooperative. He could reward or discipline in countless other ways, but he won't.

Again and again he says he's only one Senator disposing of a single vote. Pleading for another's vote, he believes, is a demeaning act. To punish recalcitrants, he thinks, is not a mark of leadership but a sign of pettiness. He will exhort groups of Democrats to give their Administration the benefit of a doubt, but he will not go further.

In sum, Mike Mansfield is surely the least assertive Congressional commander in memory. Yet, there are many who believe his laissez-faire leadership may precisely fit today's Senate mood. He has, after all, helped negotiate scads of Administration bills through the Senate this session: Protection of wilderness areas, mass transit subsidies, extension of depressed areas aid, the domestic Peace Corps, youth employment programs, water pollution controls. All these are pending in the House.

In view of this productivity, few Democrats yearn for a return to the LBJ days when, as Sen. Dodd put it, the leader "orchestrated" the Senate's discordant players. On most bills, Mr. Mansfield need hardly work up a sweat; he can sit back watching the Democrats' 2-to-1 majority overwhelm the Republicans. And if it weren't for civil rights, his job today would be easier still, for the Southern Democratic patriarchs are more tolerant toward the Texan in the White House than they were toward John F. Kennedy.

Given these advantages, Mr. Mansfield needn't be more than a traffic cop for legislation most of the time, and he doesn't aspire to a loftier role. He rarely reaches into the committees to shape bills—and he cares more about getting a committee-approved bill to a floor vote than how Senators vote.

The vote next Tuesday to end the South's filibuster against the civil rights bill is a prime example of the leader's disdain for nose-counting, an activity LBJ and his former Senate protege, the now-discredited Democratic Secretary Bobby Baker, elevated to an art. Mr. Mansfield scheduled the vote without knowing whether he commands the required two-thirds majority. If cloture isn't invoked, and if the rights bill must then be diluted, Mr. Mansfield will surely be blamed for letting impatience prompt him to strike in the dark.

Still, Mike Mansfield's noncombative, nonpartisan approach ("there are good Republicans and bad Democrats") dovetails neatly with the President's grand political strategy. LBJ would rather disarm the Republicans than clobber them. His Senate successor is well equipped by inclination and personality to execute this strategy in Congress.

Trouble With Democrats

But it's Democrats, rather than Republicans, who have given Mr. Mansfield the most distress during his 40-month reign. Sen. McClellan beat the Administration on the bill to set up a Cabinet Department of Urban Affairs. The late Sen. Kerr whipped it on "Medicare" two summers ago. Moreover, a liberal-led filibuster to stop the asserted "giveaway" of satellite communications to industry might have succeeded if Oregon's fiery Sen. Morse hadn't lost his temper. "I do not believe the Majority Leader!" Mr. Morse cried in the heat of debate; that remark sealed his defeat, because the most egregious blunder a Senator can commit is to call Mike Mansfield a liar.

For when he must, Mr. Mansfield can draw on reservoirs of strength filled over the years by fairness, by disbursing to colleagues credit that should be his, and by the universal belief that Mike Mansfield is not in politics for self-aggrandizement. In fact, as Majority Leader he pushes power away.

Take the matter of Senators' committee assignments, which are made at the beginning of each biennial Congress. The committees are really miniature Senates; they determine whether, and in what form, legislation will reach the floor. Committee decisions are rarely overruled in the Senate, for to protect their individual authority chairmen tend to vote together.

Control of the committees, obviously, is the key to control of the Senate. Before Mike Mansfield's reign, assignments were made by a coterie of elders in the Democratic Steering Committee over which the floor leader presides. Mr. Mansfield, deciding that this manner of selection was inequitable, substituted secret balloting for it. The secret ballot almost guaranteed that the leader's wishes would be ignored. At the opening of the current Congress Mr. Mansfield believed Wisconsin's Sen. Proxmire, though he opposed the Administration's tax cut plan, deserved a place on the powerful Finance Committee; in the secret ballot, Mr. Proxmire got no votes except Sen. Mansfield's.

Mike Mansfield hardly thought twice about disclosing the results of the balloting, for this son of an immigrant from Ireland is an utterly candid man. Probably the only fib to which he was ever a party involved a Navy recruiter's belief that he was 17, rather than 14, when he enlisted for World War I. After the war, he served in the Army and with the Marines in the Orient, a tour which excited a lifetime interest in Far Eastern affairs.

Back in Butte, he sweated in the copper mines as a pick-and-shovel "mucker" preparing for a delayed academic career. He crowded high school and college into four years before blossoming into a professor of Latin American and Far Eastern history at Montana State University. From there he went to the House of Representatives and, in 1952, to the Senate.

Tapped for No. 2 Post

It was Mr. Mansfield's pipe-puffing, contemplative unobtrusiveness that recommended him to Sen. Johnson when the job of whip, or deputy leader, became vacant in 1957. Mr. Mansfield was tapped for the No. 2 position, and he demonstrated no urge to share the limelight. When LBJ moved to the Vice Presidency in 1961, Mike Mansfield moved up to the leader's post.

As Mr. Johnson saw it, Mike Mansfield was, like the leader himself, another bridge between the party's Northern liberals and its Southern conservatives. The South likes him because he is not passionately involved in the agitation for civil rights; the Southwest likes him because he supports tax depletion for oil (Montana, too, is an oil-producing state); and the liberals like him because he is with them on most other controversies.

For weeks now, Sen Mansfield has fretted about the length of the South's filibuster against the civil rights bill, but he won't try to blackjack members into line, even if he could. On the only substantive vote so far (the 45-to-45 tie that defeated a Southern-supported amendment to assure jury trials for all persons accused of criminal contempt) he risked victory by caring more about honoring a commitment than about winning.

He had promised to protect the Southerners by arranging an offsetting "pair" for the absent Sen. Fulbright (D., Ark.). After the dramatic roll-call, but before the vote was announced, he scurried about to fulfill the commitment, forgetting in the bustle to send an aide after Utah's Sen. Moss, who, though prepared to vote against the amendment, didn't know the roll call was in progress. Mr. Moss ambled in too late.

Still, the 12-week-long civil rights marathon is gnawing steadily at Mr. Mansfield's latent Irish temper. No doubt the frustration of getting nowhere fast helped provoke his unusually angry public shouting match over the Bobby Baker affair with New Jersey's Sen. Clifford Case.

But as Sen. Case said afterward his brief antagonist is the gentlest and most magnanimous of men. And as the dreary Senate sessions drag on, its backlog of work growing thicker every day, Mike Mansfield will prove whether in politics, as has been said of baseball, nice guys are bound to finish last.

Cloture's Significance

* * * * * *

It May Strengthen Southern Influence on Other Matters

By JERRY LANDAUER

WASHINGTON — The Senate's historic cloture vote this week was more than a warning to the South that no longer will it be allowed to handle race relations essentially free of Federal interference.

Beyond presaging enactment of the first comprehensive civil rights law since slavery ended, the vote shattered the image of invincibility built by Southern Senators over the years. For the South's leaders contributed to the humiliation of cloture. They miscalculated the odds, gambled on a strategy that backfired, pinned false hopes on Gov. Wallace of Alabama, and wound up losing most of the Republican conservatives, who held the balance of power.

In the years ahead, the result may well be a shift, gradual and gentlemanly, in leadership from the South's old guard to younger, more flexible men less wedded to preservation of Dixie's existing social order. This, in turn, could restore Southern influence in shaping future civil rights legislation (extending Federal protection of Negro voting rights to state and local elections is sure to be proposed, for example). And, by assuaging acrimony between the Democrats' Northern and Southern wings, it could strengthen the South's voice in matters unrelated to race relations.

Formidable Opposition

To understand the great civil rights debate, one must go back to early 1964. Never before had the South faced such odds: The full force of an Administration whose Southern chief needed to establish his civil rights credentials; and the combined pressure of powerful unions, numerous women's groups, scores of civil rights organizations, and, for the first time, intensive lobbying by organized religion.

To protect its segregated social system, the South had only one real weapon: The ability to delay Senate action by debating interminably. The filibuster could kill the bill unless two-thirds of the Senators were prepared, at some time, to check it by cloture.

Thus, the issue facing Sen. Richard Russell's 18-man Southern bloc when Democratic leader Mansfield moved on March 9 to take up the House-passed bill was how best to deploy the filibuster. There were, essentially, two choices.

The South could stand resolutely firm, spurning compromise, in the hope that enough border state Democrats and conservative Republicans would regard the House bill as too extreme and would help block cloture indefinitely. If cloture could not be imposed, Lyndon Johnson would have to accept a mild bill that was, in turn, acceptable to the South.

An alternative strategy was this: The South could take a flexible position, disdaining an obvious filibuster, by allowing one amendment after another to come to a vote, each sandwiched by three or four days of debate. In this way, the bill might be rewritten on the floor to make it more palatable. And if the South seemed to be trying to amend a harsh bill in good faith, the Senate's historic hesitancy to reach for cloture might yield more far-reaching concessions as the weeks rolled by.

Division of Opinion

The Southern caucus, over which Georgia's Russell presided as unofficial chairman of the strategy board, was divided. A small group to which Florida's Sen. Smathers, Arkansas' Fulbright and, to a lesser extent, Georgia's Talmadge adhered, argued for a flexible stance. But most of the older men decided to go for broke; that is, to risk total defeat by gambling for total victory.

On the tactical level, the go-for-broke strategy dictated resisting any amendments that might weaken parts of the bill somewhat but that would leave its key features intact. For if the House bill were diluted, even mildly, GOP conservatives might swing to the cloture camp. "If we can prevent the bill being watered down by amendments, we've got a good chance to defeat it all," Mississippi's Eastland reasoned.

Three developments strengthened the hard-liners in the Southern bloc: The massive volume of mail from every part of the country opposing the bill; conservative Sen. Barry Goldwater's progress toward the Republican Presidential nomination (Mr. Goldwater's close ally, Republican John Tower of Texas, sometimes sat in the Dixie caucus); and the surprising number of votes Gov. Wallace collected in the Wisconsin, Indiana and Maryland primaries.

Surveying the mail and the votes Gov. Wallace gathered, many Southerners became genuinely convinced that the "white backlash" was more than a passing phenomenon, and that it would kill the bill. But the hopes which were fed by the votes for Wallace failed to materialize.

Misled by outside occurrences, the South missed one opportunity after another to seize the Congressional initiative. The best opportunity offered itself when Republican leader Dirksen of Illinois, cool to the House-passed bill, suggested amendments that would have denied the Executive branch any real role in enforcing it. Under Mr. Dirksen's original plan, the new rights given to Negroes by the bill—chiefly the legal right to equal opportunity in employment and equal access to public accommodations —would have to be asserted in court by aggrieved individuals; neither the Justice Department nor the proposed Equal Employment Opportunities Commission could help.

Senate floor, was excluded from the backstage negotiations. In those discussions, the bill was indeed diluted, but not in the direction sought by Sen. Russell. Its impact on the North was greatly softened ("The impact on three-quarters of the country is going to be nil," says New Jersey's GOP Sen. Case) and it was made to apply full-force to the South.

Isolated by Mr. Dirksen's Republicans and by Northern Democrats, the South could only fume helplessly. "There has been scurrying like rats for a hole to prevent this bill from applying to certain parts of the country," Sen. Russell complained, with some justification. But once the Administration's accord with Sen. Dirksen was sealed, cracking the filibuster was just a matter of time.

Element of Tragedy

There is a certain element of tragedy in all this for the Southern Senators. If indeed, as some predict, the bill is so harsh that its enforcement will heighten racial hostility, the Southerners are in part to blame. In a sense, they hid behind the filibuster, and whatever contribution their expertise might have made toward a better bill was lost. Gov. Wallace's showing in the primaries boxed them into inflexibility; for after praising his performance they could not, in public, seem less hard-line than he. For Sen. Sparkman of Alabama, particularly, moderation might have invited Mr. Wallace to contend for his Senate seat in 1966.

Yet the bill's certain passage offers an opportunity for the South's leaders. For years, much of their energy has been diverted to civil rights. They've bunched some of their best men on the committee that handles rights legislation. They've battled minor changes in the cumbersome Senate rules to keep their tactical advantage. And some have felt bound to support the Republicans for fear GOP conservatives would desert them in a civil rights showdown.

Responding to Mr. Dirksen's leadership, the GOP conservatives this week did indeed leave the South in the lurch; only six of 33 Republicans sided with Dixie in the cloture vote. What remained of the moribund Southern Democratic-conservative Republican coalition seems dead, and Sen. Russell's prestige has suffered badly.

But now that the big Negro rights struggle is over, the South's Senators can grasp for even greater Congressional influence. If, for example, the civil rights bogey can be overcome, the South's power in the Congressional Democratic Party would surely expand. Younger, more flexible Southerners — in particular Florida's Smathers, Georgia's Talmadge and Louisiana's Long—would grow in stature, especially if they avoided identification with the filibuster. And in the years ahead, the moderate leaders could take part in shaping civil rights legislation instead of, as in 1964, being smothered by it.

Backers of Interest Equalization Tax Violated All the Rules

WASHINGTON—If you have a bill you want Congress to pass, there is a right way to go about it. Any old-time lobbyist, for example, would give you this advice:

Be logical. Make sure your bill is consistent with your past position. It would look odd if the AFL-CIO drafted a national right-to-work bill, or the American Medical Association suddenly came out for medicare.

If your bill affects relatively few people, be sure to line up their support ahead of time. To avoid embarrassing mistakes, let them check over technical details.

Don't equivocate, once your bill is drafted. Firmly insist from the beginning that it's exactly the right way to handle the situation. Save the compromises for later, when it looks as if you may lose.

Hurry. The longer it takes to pass your bill, the more opportunities your enemies will have to set snares.

But if all this advice is so good, why does there sit on President Johnson's desk H.R. 8000, a bill imposing an "interest equalization" tax on foreign securities? From the moment it became a gleam in Treasury Secretary Dillon's eye, this Administration bill has broken all these hoary rules and more besides. Yet enough rank-and-file lawmakers voted for it to put the measure, after a 13-month Congressional journey, within range of Mr. Johnson's pen.

This is an account of H.R. 8000's unusual legislative history, with a mention of some of the special factors that allowed Administration lobbyists to throw away the rulebook.

Treasury's Activities

The story starts in the late spring of last year. Treasury boss Dillon earlier had been making some headway against the U.S. balance-of-payments deficit. He and the Treasury's monetary expert, Robert Roosa, also had established themselves as apostles of freely flowing international movements of goods and capital; Mr. Roosa swore he would resign before ever agreeing to Government controls over the exchange of dollars into other currencies.

But the Treasury that spring watched with mounting worry the parade of Canadians, Western Europeans and Japanese to New York's convenient, low-cost money market. Sales of their stocks and bonds to Americans doubled and trebled over the 1960 volume, and the dollars received in payment gouged deep minus signs in Uncle Sam's international account book.

Though President Kennedy endorsed an increase in the Federal Reserve's discount rate, he wasn't keen for a clampdown on credit stringent enough to lift general U.S. interest rates out of the international bargain basement. So in early July, the Treasury came up with the plan to impose a special tax on U.S. purchases of foreign stocks and bonds. More a tariff than a revenue raiser, the tax was intended to raise the cost of money to foreigners without putting a similar pinch on domestic borrowers.

Mr. Dillon in the months that followed insisted the tax would be only a "dampener" on capital movements, not a direct form of Government control. Nevertheless, throughout the long legislative battle, securities market dealers and business groups bitterly accused the Treasury of abandoning its free market stance.

Congress Not Impressed

As it turned out these charges made little impression on Congress, and may actually have helped the bill. A strong strain of latent protectionism has run through the 88th Congress, and many lawmakers who favored a stronger anti-dumping law and meat import quotas saw nothing wrong with a tariff on money.

But certainly the benefit to the Treasury did not derive from any widespread belief that Mr. Dillon and friends had presented a case logically consistent with past positions. Nor did the Treasury pay much heed to the need to line up advance support for its "interest equalization" tax plan; in fact, those most directly affected—inhabitants of New York's money market—knew nothing about the idea until President Kennedy formally announced it to all on Thursday, July 18, 1963.

The secrecy, of course, was deemed necessary to avoid giving an advantage to securities market traders. And for this reason, drafting of the complex tax had to proceed without consultation with private securities market experts who could have been asked to spot technical pitfalls and perhaps even enlisted as supporters of the bill. The lack of technical liaison with New York required the Treasury later to keep handing Congress a long series of minor changes as the bill progressed.

As the hour of Mr. Kennedy's announcement approached on July 18, the Treasury put into motion a plan synchronized as carefully as an amphibious invasion. Messrs. Dillon, Roosa and Joseph Barr, the Treasury's lobbyist, fanned out on Capitol Hill to explain the tax to key lawmakers. Treasury messengers were posted to the offices of the New York and American stock exchanges, with instructions to deliver a copy of the President's request at the stroke of noon. Treasury representatives by prearrangement were in the offices of the finance ministers of Canada, France and Switzerland, ready to brief them on the proposal.

The bombshell effect on the world's financial capitals was gratifying proof of surprise, but it meant trouble for Mr. Dillon. Prices crashed on the Tokyo Stock Exchange, and there were market reverberations in London, Amsterdam, Brussels, Paris and Toronto. A swarm of high Canadian government officials cornered Mr. Dillon the weekend after the President's announcement. After some resistance, the Treasury Secretary agreed to amend the bill so that the President could grant an exemption from the tax to new issues of securities from countries threatened with financial chaos. Mr. Dillon said the loophole would fit Canada.

But by his early surrender to the Canadians, Mr. Dillon brutally violated the "Don't Equivocate" rule. House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Wilbur Mills (D., Ark.) at first wanted to deny any escape clause and remove Administration temptations to cave in under pressure to other countries. Mr. Dillon eventually calmed these fears, and the clause remains in the bill, but the whole episode wasn't very reassuring to lawmakers about the care with which the original version had been drafted.

Nor was the Treasury able to hurry its package through the legislative process. Chairman Mills' Ways and Means Committee on July 18 was preoccupied with Mr. Kennedy's tax-cutting bill. It was not until August 20 that the 25-member group could start hearings on the interest equalization tax. Mr. Dillon, the first witness, said the levy would be "effective and fair," but almost all other testimony was hostile.

"We were at our low point on the day Dillon went in to testify on the bill," recalls ex-lobbyist Barr, who is now chairman of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corp. "But from there things kept improving steadily."

Tax Made Retroactive

The improvement was due in great part to a unique feature of Mr. Kennedy's original proposal: The tax, when enacted, would be retroactive to the date on which it was recommended. The Treasury even distributed forms for securities dealers to fill out, with the compliance machinery stopping just short of actually collecting the tax. Not much of this paperwork was really done, though, because trading in foreign securities withered abruptly while everybody waited to see what Congress would do.

After the August hearings, Congress did nothing. The inactivity was deceptively encouraging to securities market critics of "the law that is not a law." But the longer Congress dallied, the longer the drought in foreign securities trading continued. And by the time the Ways and Means Committee got around to considering the levy again in late October, Mr. Dillon was able to brag that the tax had proved its ability to help the balance of payments.

This "it works" theme was of great importance. Few Congressmen try to specialize in the mysteries of international finance, but many are aware of the balance of payments problem and are anxious to do something about it. By stressing the tax's results, Treasury officials in their missionary visits to lawmakers' private offices were able to win some key converts.

For example, three Republicans refused to sign the sharp GOP dissenting report when the Ways and Means Committee at last approved the bill in December. By the time the bill came to a House vote in March, even the most conservative Southerners were content to follow the lead of Mr. Mills in voting for it; the bill passed 238 to 142.

The House's experience with the tax was almost exactly duplicated in the Senate: A long period of inactivity due to the civil rights filibuster; bitter opposition from most witnesses at the eventual hearings; a revival of rumors that the bill would die; vigorous use of the "it works" pitch in Mr. Dillon's private lobbying. Also, the Treasury continued to propose scores of technical amendments to cover problems that had not been foreseen. Result: The bill that passed the Senate early this month by a vote of 45 to 28 was roughly what Mr. Kennedy had asked for.

"It's the worst bill I've seen in 14 years," exclaimed Rep. Curtis (R., Mo.) during the House debate in March. Maybe so, but "interest equalization" is about to become law —a success that ignores all the rules of the game.

Congress Dislikes Such Amendments, But Uses Them Often

BY ARLEN J. LARGE

WASHINGTON—A new act of Congress may save George Douglas some money the next time he goes out to buy a baby elephant.

Mr. Douglas is director of the municipal zoo in New Orleans. Like public zoo-keepers across the country, he may find imported wild animal prices a little cheaper because of the bill relaxing somewhat a 7.5% Federal duty on incoming lions, leopards, snakes, monkeys, elephants and such.

Though the new law isn't as sweeping as Mr. Douglas wanted, it's possible the wild animal tariff rules wouldn't have been liberalized at all, save for one of those legislative accidents that makes the work of Congress so unpredictable.

The wild animal bill, lying dead in the Senate, was yanked dramatically to life by the utterly unrelated furor over meat imports. When farm-state Senators picked the animal measure as a legislative vehicle for a meat import quota amendment or "rider," it was spurred into a hair-raising gallop direct to the White House.

Legislating by rider is frowned upon in the procedure-conscious Congress; the technique has an often-uncontrollable effect on the bill selected as the vehicle, and it gives the appearance of unseemly haste. But the practice of attaching a piece of totally unrelated legislation to another bill is in fact employed rather often. The Senate finds the device a key weapon in its rivalry with the House and brushes with the President.

The subject matter can be vastly more important than the prices of lions and hamburger. Right now the most celebrated rider in Congress is Senate Minority Leader Dirksen's proposed rein on court-ordered reapportionment of state legislatures. The Illinois Republican has offered his reapportionment delay plan as an amendment to the foreign aid bill—selected because it's well along the road to passage and because President Johnson would be unlikely to veto it.

Sen. Dirksen has admitted it "may seem a little incongruous" to mix problems of state politics with those of the State Department, "but beggars cannot be choosers." His choice of vehicles was a blow to Sen. Fulbright (D., Ark.), who already faced plenty of trouble piloting the foreign aid measure to Senate passage. A junior filibuster by Senate liberals against the reapportionment rider has given other Senators more time to think up new anti-aid amendments. And a number of pro-aid urban House members are threatening to vote against the whole bill if it comes back from the Senate carrying the Dirksen rider.

The use of riders is a bipartisan matter. During his days as Senate majority leader, Lyndon Johnson showed superb legislative horsemanship. In early 1960 he wanted the Senate to start debating a civil rights bill but there was nothing to debate; the House had not yet passed a bill, and no civil rights measure could be expected from the Dixie-dominated Senate Judiciary Committee.

So, Mr. Johnson invited his colleagues to offer civil rights amendments to an innocent House-passed bill allowing school children in Stella, Mo., to hold classes in an unused Army building. In its transformed version the Stella school bill kicked off a full-blown Southern filibuster. Later the House passed its own civil rights bill that, after compromise with the Senate, became the Civil Rights Act of 1960. Having served its purpose, the Stella school bill, stripped of its amendments, went on to the White House.

Another Johnson Triumph

Mr. Johnson helped saddle up another rider that year to scamper around a House barrier to new housing legislation. The Senate had passed a big housing bill, but further action was blocked by the House Rules Committee. On the day before Congress adjourned, an emergency Senate rider extending the college housing loan program and other expiring activities was tacked onto a House-passed bill dealing with an observance of the Constitution's 175th anniversary. The rider was accepted by the House the same afternoon.

This sort of thing continues to offend many House members—especially those Rules Committee conservatives who feel it endangers their power to block undesired legislation. Rep. Colmer (D., Miss.) is sponsoring a proposed House rules change designed to hobble the rider technique: Any "ungermane" Senate amendment to a House bill would have to be approved by a two-thirds House vote instead of today's simple majority. But there's been no action on Rep. Colmer's idea, and strange amendments continue to crop up on House bills.

As with the reapportionment rider to the foreign aid bill, these amendments can mean trouble for the bills selected as the vehicles.

Rep. Keogh (D., N.Y.) thought liquor importers had a legitimate complaint about tax refunds: If defects in imported whiskey made it impossible to market the product, it was hard for U.S. importers to send the goods back and claim a refund on the excise tax they had paid to Uncle Sam. Thus, Rep. Keogh last year introduced a bill permitting an easier refund in such cases. The measure was moving slowly through Congress with no real trouble until this summer, when Sen. Hartke (D., Ind.) caused consternation among liquor importers by putting an amendment on it.

The amendment dealt with a fearfully complex tax problem for department stores using revolving credit plans. Wrangling between retail lobby groups and the Treasury over the amendment's exact wording held up Senate action on the whiskey bill during much of August. "At one point I was sure our bill would be lost," recalls M. W. Fillius, representing the National Association of Alcoholic Beverage Importers. "I was taking steps to have our bill attached as a rider to something else." This wasn't necessary as it turned out; the department store men reached a compromise and the amended whiskey bill went on to the President.

The Wild Animal Bill

Riders that bring dead bills to life are more rare. Examine more closely the history of that wild animal bill. Primarily to help an animal importer in his district, Rep. Teague (R., Calif.) last year introduced the measure making it easier for importers to claim exemption from the 7.5% duty on wild animals and birds. Such agencies as the Interior and Treasury departments had no objection to it, and the bill picked up strong support from Mr. Douglas and other zoo directors who thought it would reduce animal deaths caused by alleged customs clearance delays at dockside. The bill passed the House with little discussion Feb. 26, 1963.

But the measure soon was beset by complaints from the National Audubon Society, the Defenders of Wildlife, Inc., the Animal Welfare Institute, the Cape Henry Bird Club and the late Rachel Carson. They charged the bill would encourage scruffy roadside zoos. There was a brief hearing on the bill before the Senate Finance Committee, after which it was firmly caged up.

Last March, Senate pressures for a curb on meat imports became unrestrainable. Farm-state lawmakers despaired of getting any action from the quota-wary House Ways and Means Committee, where trade legislation ordinarily originates. So, Senate Majority Leader Mansfield (D., Mont.) asked Senate Finance Committee Chairman Harry Byrd (D., Va.) whether his panel was sitting on any House-passed trade measure to which a meat quota amendment could be attached. Only the wild animal bill was available.

Sen. Keating (R., N.Y.) was lying in ambush when the wild animal bill, carrying its meat import amendment, reached the Senate floor in late July. Echoing the complaints of the wildlife groups, he succeeded in having the original wild animal portion of the bill removed entirely. This left only Rep. Teague's original bill number, H. R. 1839, and the meat quota amendment.

Cattle industry lobbyists swarmed the Capitol for days as House-Senate conferees tried to work out a compromise meat quota plan. Only at the end did Rep. Curtis (R., Mo.), who is a constant critic of the Senate's ungermane amendments, ask his fellow conferees what happened to the wild animals. A modified provision was inserted broadening duty-free treatment for animals ultimately sold to zoos.

Mr. Douglas of the New Orleans zoo says the final version doesn't solve the problem of animals dying on the docks. "This child ain't mine," declared Rep. Teague in a comic speech to the House. The Californian says he's not sure whether to try again next year. If he does, he may once again need a timely rider to spur his bill through the Senate's jungles.

Creeping Congress?

Slow Legislating Pace Seen as Turmoil Marks Big Organizing Chores

Delays Likely for 'Medicare,' Excise Cuts, Education Aid Despite Big LBJ Majority

Struggles Over Leadership

BY ARLEN J. LARGE
Staff Reporter of THE WALL STREET JOURNAL

WASHINGTON—The new Democratic Congress will approve, lickety-split, one request expected soon from President Johnson: A little extra time to submit his annual economic report, now awkwardly due on Inauguration Day.

To win the bulk of his "Great Society" legislation, however, Mr. Johnson will have to wait awhile—a wait that may seem surprisingly long in view of the massive Democratic majorities in both House and Senate.

The 89th Congress that convenes today is bound eventually to deliver handsomely for the President. But the pace of production is likely to seem disappointingly slow at times for advocates of early new doses of Federal aid to education, fast "medicare" for the aged and instant excise tax cuts. After Mr. Johnson outlines his wants in tonight's State-of-the-Union address, there will be a considerable delay while Congressional Democrats marshal the votes to put them through. In some instances the delay may stretch all the way into next year.

There are votes aplenty for a generously financed educational system, for example, which has come to be regarded as the Great Society's touchstone. But before these votes can be cast, the long deadlock over Federal aid to Catholic schools must be bypassed, even if the aid plan is narrower and more specialized than the old idea of general assistance to public schools. Before all the competing "solutions" can be reconciled, Congress may find itself well into the 1966 session.

Outlook for Medicare

Some form of hospital care for the aged financed by a compulsory payroll tax is almost sure to be approved this year. But hard bargaining still is required on its exact form; hardly anyone agrees with the forecast of Democratic Sen. Anderson of New Mexico, a longtime medicare sponsor, that a bill can be on the President's desk by Easter, April 18.

Retail merchants who are plugging for repeal of excise taxes on handbags and such by early spring will be rebuffed; passage of the excise-cutting bill will deliberately be held up until late June, to coincide with the start of the Government's bookkeeping year.

All new Congresses seem to start slowly on their two-year stints, as members spend the early months organizing committees and holding hearings on proposed bills. The wheels promise to move more slowly than usual this year, however, if only because of the huge number of newcomers brought in by November's Democratic landslide. Committee assignments must be found for no less than 71 new House Democrats, the biggest job hunt in years.

The opening organizational chores also are marked this year by unusual turmoil. Quarrelsome House Republicans meet this morning to choose between Charles Halleck of Indiana and Gerald Ford of Michigan for their leader; at about the same time, Senate Democrats will be settling an extra-sharp contest for Assistant Majority Leader between Russell Long of Louisiana, John Pastore of Rhode Island and Mike Monroney of Oklahoma. Both battles are sure to leave ill-feeling. Some Southern House Democrats already are boiling about Saturday's vote of the party caucus to yank the seniority privileges of two members—John Bell Williams of Mississippi and Albert Watson of South Carolina—who campaigned for Sen. Goldwater; Rep. Watson yesterday threatened he would pull out of the Democratic Party rather than remain a "second-class Democrat."

Milder Changes

The opening ferment could have been much greater, however, had Congressional liberals chosen to make a really ferocious assault on old traditions and procedures. The liberal Democratic Study Group in the House, rather than clip the bill-blocking power of all committee chairmen, settled for milder changes trimming the power only of the Rules Committee, which hasn't been much of a problem lately; the main change, giving Speaker McCormack authority to wrest a bill from the Rules Committee after a 21-day stoppage, was endorsed by a majority of House Democrats Saturday. Some Republican help will be needed, however, to vote it into the House rulebook today.

In the Senate, the biennial liberal attempt to make it easier to end filibusters actually promises to be less vigorous than in the past. Passage of the 1964 civil rights bill has taken much of the heat from this issue, and some liberals are discovering the filibuster's virtue as a protector of state legislative reapportionment.

The rather relaxed approach of would-be Congressional reformers, despite the expanded liberal numbers, reflects an unhurried atmosphere that generally pervades the new Congress. The mood contrasts sharply with that of early 1959, when the House was full of zealous new Democrats who found themselves unexpectedly elected from Republican districts.

"The people who climb the walls with zeal around here are the people who don't come back after one term," observes Rep. Sydney Herlong, a conservative Democratic ninth-termer from Florida. The caution of today's newcomers hints they're anxious to help their re-election chances by playing according to traditional rules. "I'm not going to be out carrying the torch for any liberal causes," asserts Rep. John Dow, a 59-year-old freshman Democrat elected from a normally Republican district in New York. "I'll judge each issue as it comes along."

Tinkering With Timetables

The less-than-frantic tempo also is reflected in some key committee timetables. Rep. George Mahon, the Texas Democrat who last year became chairman of the House Appropriations Committee, is considering a departure from the usual practice of handling the President's budget. In the past, it has been immediately split into sections for piecemeal consideration by subcommittees; Rep. Mahon would like to precede this with a few days of preliminary hearings on the whole budget by his full 50-man appropriations group.

There may be some exceptions to the sluggish legislative pace, especially among bills that were close to passage at the 88th Congress' adjournment last October. One of these was Mr. Johnson's aid-to-Appalachia proposal, which like all leftover legislation must be relaunched from the beginning. However, the Senate is expected to give a new Appalachia bill a fast start this month, and backers now are sure they have plenty of House votes to pass it. Another early-starting bill will provide new funds for loans to business firms in depressed areas, probably combined with added money for construction of local public works.

Not nearly so much speed is in store, however, for Mr. Johnson's highest-priority bills, notably an aid-to-education package. The President tonight will explain briefly his key proposals for sidestepping the church-state roadblock to Federal aid for secondary schools, and details will be spelled out in a special message targeted for next week. Lengthy haggling is sure to follow.

Another part of the education package, it's true, isn't expected to cause great controversy; it deals with college-level assistance where the religious issue isn't so pronounced. The President is expected to propose, for example, Federal scholarships for college undergraduates, expanding the existing assistance available to graduate students only. The package also may include a new system of Federal repayment guarantees for private loans to college students.

State-Religion Clash

In trying to help secondary schools, the Administration won't risk repeating President Kennedy's head-on push for direct school construction grants—the proposal which brought the clash between public school aiders and the Catholic hierarchy. Prospects for Congressional approval of such a plan are no more favorable than before; the 107 Catholics in the new Congress comprise the single largest religious group, bumping the Methodists from their accustomed first place.

It's clear now that Mr. Johnson will try to fuzz up the Kennedy era's sharp distinctions between public and parochial schools with a program of aid to both kinds, or some of both, for certain purposes. The exact form of the aid still is being studied; money could be offered to public and parochial schools in areas suffering from high unemployment, or to public schools attended on a "shared time" basis by Catholic children, or to both kinds for the purchase of non-religious textbooks.

All these possibilities have their champions in Congress, and it will be Mr. Johnson's main job to coax the lawmakers into agreement on a single plan. This could be a protracted process in the House Education and Labor Committee, which faces a heavy workload of other legislation.

This panel and its Senate counterpart also must consider a big expansion of funds for the antipoverty program established last year, plus organized labor's demand for expansion of coverage of the $1.25-an-hour Federal minimum wage and repeal of the Taft-Hartley provision authorizing state right-to-work laws that ban the union shop. Mainly because of the priority he's giving other bills, the President isn't likely to press for repeal of this provision until late in the 1965 session.

Before the House Ways and Means Committee can plunge again into the medicare fight, it must tackle heavy organizational chores. Two Democratic seats will be added to the existing 15, and the 10 Republican seats will be cut to 8. The committee's Democrats also have the job of making committee assignments for all other House Democrats, a process that may last almost until Inauguration Day, Jan. 20.

The medicare fight itself won't go fast. True, Ways and Means Chairman Wilbur Mills of Arkansas now appears to favor some kind of medical care program for the elderly, as long as it's financed from a separate fund and contains benefits considerably short of the Administration plan for 60-day hospitalization. As a time-saver, Mr. Mills plans no new public hearings. But his committee may consume more than six weeks in argument and drafting before a medical bill, combined with a boost in regular Social Security pensions, is ready for a House vote.

More time will then be required for a public hearing on the bill by the Senate Finance Committee, chaired by medicare foe Harry Byrd of Virginia. The House bill probably will be extensively liberalized on the Senate floor, sending the measure back into the House-Senate conference room where it died last October. Democratic Rep. Cecil King of California, main House sponsor of medicare, is hoping final agreement on a compromise bill can be reached by June.

While the Senate toils on medicare, the House by about May should be considering an annual $2 billion or $3 billion of excise tax reductions. Certain to be repealed are $500 million in levies on handbags, furs, jewelry and cosmetics. The fight will center on reduction of various excises collected at the manufacturers' level, such as the 10% tax on autos.

Congressional tax experts, already worried about a squabble among affected industries over distribution of the cuts, hope the excise bill won't get mired in a lobbyists' fight over new revenue for the interstate highway program, which is mainly financed by excise taxes not slated for reduction. If any of these have to be raised, it probably will be done in separate legislation. The Treasury wants the excise cuts passed before June 30 if at all possible; any protracted delays might hurt sales of merchandise on which taxes will be cut.

Only after medicare and excise bills are enacted will the tax-writing committees have much time to consider other legislation, such as tighter tax rules for foundations and probable extension for another year of the 1964-imposed tax on American purchases of foreign securities.

Among other Administration measures facing almost certain delay is relaxation of tight immigration quotas; there's strong opposition deep within the House and Senate Judiciary Committees to any significant liberalization. While the Senate will easily approve again a Constitutional amendment on Presidential succession and disability, the House has done little spadework on the matter. Recent U.S. library-burnings in foreign capitals and the restiveness of foreign aid champion Sen. William Fulbright point to renewed trouble and delay for the Administration's 1965 economic aid request.

Delay doesn't mean ultimate defeat for Mr. Johnson's big bills, however. The heavily Democratic lineup in the new Congress prompted this gloomy prediction by defeated Republican conservative Ed Foreman of Texas in his last newsletter to constituents: "This probably means that the Great Society will have little, if any, trouble gaining approval by Congress—and by 1966, medicare, Federal aid and regulation of education, revised and more liberal immigration laws . . . et al may very likely be enacted into law as realities."

Senate Democrats Face North-South Clash Over Whip, Steering Committee, Filibuster

WASHINGTON—Senate Democrats, not to be outdone by their brethren in the House of Representatives, will engage in a little intraparty bloodletting of their own today. Three important contests, two of which come up even before the curtain formally rises on the 89th Congress, will revive the old emotion-filled confrontation of North and South.

When the Democratic caucus holds its organizational meeting this morning, it must decide a three-cornered race for the post of Assistant Majority Leader and vote on a resolution to enlarge the Steering Committee. And probably the first order of business when the Senate convenes will be the regular attempt of liberals to make it easier to curb filibusters.

Increasing the Steering Committee's membership to 19 from 15, a liberal goal that has been largely overlooked in the excitement of the Assistant Majority Leader, or Whip, contest, is more important than it may appear on the surface. The Steering Committee wields the enormous power of appointment to the Senate's other standing committees. Liberals have complained for years that Southerners have employed their 9-to-6 domination of the committee to punish enemies and reward allies.

Under terms of the resolution to be offered by three Northern senators (Messrs. Magnuson of Washington, McNamara of Michigan and Jackson of Washington) one of the four new members would have to come from the West, two from the Midwest and one from the East. This could enable liberal-leaning Northerners to acquire the upper hand for the first time in parceling out committee assignments.

Whip Race Could Be Key

Advocates of Steering Committee expansion claim to be optimistic about their chances. But the dimension of their victory, if it's achieved, could depend to a large degree on the outcome of the Whip race which matches Sens. Russell Long of Louisiana, Pastore of Rhode Island and Monroney of Oklahoma. The whip is automatically a member of the Steering Committee, and Vice President-elect Humphrey, who is vacating the post, was one of the six members on whom Northerners counted in the past.

If Senator Long should win, the South would still enjoy a 10-to-9 edge even in an enlarged committee. The Steering Committee issue has thus sharpened the obvious geographic aspects of the contest to succeed Mr. Humphrey.

Sen. Long, because of his stand on tax and welfare legislation, has enticed some liberal support, including Sen. Douglas of Illinois. But of the roughly 30 votes he expects on the first ballot, 21 are expected to come from the 11 Southern states.

The Senator is banking heavily on the hope that what he calls "this North-South thing" is abating because of last year's passage of the civil rights bill. In a television interview yesterday (Face the Nation, CBS), he even voiced an ambition of eventually becoming Majority Leader.

"I would hope some day I might be considered for the next step up, as the Majority Leader of the Senate, if I did a good job as the assistant to the leader," he said. The remark evidently wasn't aimed as a threat to Sen. Mansfield, however, because a little later Sen. Long praised his incumbent chief as "one of the most considerate and honest and dependable men I have ever met in my life."

First-Ballot Win Unlikely

Although the Louisianan is conceded a slight edge in this morning's first ballot votes, it appears most unlikely he will have the 35 required for election. If the ground rules suggested by Majority Leader Mansfield are adopted by the caucus, the odds are for a paper-thin victory in the second round by either Sen. Long or Sen. Pastore.

Sen. Mansfield has proposed, to avoid a long series of ballots and maneuvering which could create ill feelings within the party, to eliminate the last man on each ballot. If only the three avowed candidates are nominated, and if most of the informal head counts are accurate, this will take Sen. Monroney out after the first ballot.

While Sen. Monroney has never acknowledged it, his strategy has always been that of a compromise candidate. He has hoped to pick up later support from backers of both Sen. Pastore and Sen. Long as a deadlock developed between those front runners. He has already announced his opposition to Sen. Mansfield's proposed rules, but his chances of altering them seem slim, as both Sen. Pastore and Sen Anderson (N.M.), manager of Sen. Long's campaign, have agreed to them.

Their willingness to abide by the Majority Leader's proposal indicates both the Long and Pastore forces expect to benefit from Mr. Monroney's elimination. Sen. Anderson reasons that even though Sen. Pastore will probably pick up the bulk of the Oklahoman's votes, Sen. Long will be so close to victory on the first ballot that he will need only a handful of added backers.

Filibuster Rule Change

Should the liberals win both the Whip fight and the battle over enlarging the Steering Committee, it would strengthen their hand enormously in the attempt to amend Senate Rule XXII. This permits the Senate to cut off debate by a two-thirds vote of those present. In the past, junior Senators have been dissuaded from helping to change this rule by fear Southerners on the Steering Committee would deny them the committee assignments they wanted. Southern forces have made the most of this concern by putting off meetings of the Steering Committee until after the filibuster question was settled. If the liberals take control of the Steering Committee, it will mean the end of Southern reprisals. In fact, the antifilibuster group would then be in a position to hand out rewards of its own.

A group of filibuster opponents met yesterday afternoon in Sen. Anderson's office to plan their tactics for this session. Details of the discussion were kept secret, but it is known an attempt will be made to amend Rule XXII so that a vote of only three-fifths of Senators present can cut off debate. Such an amendment of Senate rules must be brought up and disposed of before the Senate starts its regular business.

Ford Ousts Halleck as GOP House Leader As Younger Elements in Party Score Coup

WASHINGTON—House Republicans cast off the man who has come to symbolize their feelings of legislative impotence and anointed a new leader, Michigan's Rep. Ford.

Deposed as House minority leader in a well-executed coup by younger, innovation-minded elements within the party was Indiana's Rep. Halleck.

Though elected to succeed him by a margin of 73 to 67, Mr. Ford quickly set about fulfilling his pre-vote pledge to brighten up the party's image. Smiling before the television kleig lights, the ruggedly constructed lawmaker promised to "get Republicans from all parts of the spectrum working together" in "selling Republican alternatives to the public."

The struggle that led up to yesterday's leadership showdown involves a good deal more than imagery and symbolism, of course. Ford backers, emboldened by their success, are intent on a major renovation of GOP policy-making machinery. Their objective, one that younger Congressmen in particular feel Mr. Halleck thwarted, is to broaden participation in policy deliberations and to generate more new legislative ideas.

Impact Seen on Drive to Oust Burch

But the simple fact that the Republican status quo has been uprooted in the House would appear to have symbolic impact on the struggle for national party leadership. Indeed, several anti-Goldwater GOP "moderates" were quick to claim the Halleck defeat as a step in their drive to replace Republican National Chairman Dean Burch. Both Govs. Romney of Michigan and Scranton of Pennsylvania, according to Republican lawmakers from those two states, gave private encouragement to the anti-Halleck movement with at least one eye to their own efforts to wrest party control from Goldwater forces.

Mr. Ford, for his part, disclaimed any involvement in the national committee power struggle, which figures to come to a head later this month at a committee gathering in Chicago. "My election had no relation whatsoever to the election that will take place in Chicago," he told reporters.

Certainly a comparison of the Ford and Halleck voting records in the House gives no hint of any leftward move in GOP legislative policies. The two men have pursued almost identical courses through the years, always sticking closely to the party's middle. And although Mr. Ford shied away from Mr. Goldwater's Presidential campaign last fall, colleagues say he was more than ready to take second place on a Goldwater-led ticket at last summer's GOP convention.

Image More Than Ideology

In his successful bid for the House leadership post, the 51-year-old Mr. Ford drew largely on his reputation for fairmindedness and hard work, built up over 14 years of Congressional duty. His youngish face, football stardom at the University of Michigan and service as a Naval officer in World War II probably all contributed more to his success than any ideological appeal. In fact, he steadfastly resisted efforts by various party factions to pin him down to a specific course on coming legislation or on the appointment of a lieutenant.

"His firm refusal to make any deals was what ultimately put Rep. Ford over," insisted a loyal backer from the party's Eastern liberal wing. "He convinced both the Goldwater types and the Easterners that he wasn't anybody's captive."

When the showdown came, Ford support spanned the GOP spectrum, including such maverick New Englanders as Reps. Conte of Massachusetts and Tupper of Maine along with such conservative Dixie Republicans as Reps. Cramer of Florida and Callaway of Georgia. The hard core of his backing came, however, from young activists of the middle captained by Reps. Goodell of New York, Griffin of Michigan and Quie of Minnesota. They put together a force of more than 20 colleagues to carry the Ford campaign by telephone to the rest of the 140 House Republicans who survived last November's election. Mr. Halleck, by contrast, had to do most of his own contact work.

Ford Faces Immediate Tests

The construction of the Ford alliance remained shaky, however, and just holding it together should provde a quick and critical test of his leadership ability. Add to his worries the problem of establishing authority over Mr. Halleck and his backers, and the challenge becomes all the more imposing.

The mere naming of a second-in-command—a step Mr. Ford avoided yesterday—could well rekindle bitter factional rivalries that were largely patched over durng the contest for the top spot. Several Halleck supporters have made it clear that they will press for the retention of the present No. 2 man, Minority Whip Arends of Illinois. But his selection as a concession to the Halleck camp runs against the grain of younger Ford men who are committed to weeding out GOP Old Guardsmen from all posts of influence.

The election yesterday of Wisconsin's Rep. Laird, a conservative, to succeed Mr. Ford as presiding officer at House GOP conferences brings a useful activist and a Ford man to that position. Anti-Goldwater forces, joined in a group that calls itself the Wednesday Club, eye Mr. Laird suspiciously, however, and will press hard for one of their own number, probably Vermont's Rep. Stafford, as party whip. Wednesday Clubbers made a last-minute effort to derail the Laird selection, but ther candidate, Rep. Frelinghuysen of New Jersey, was defeated by a 77 to 62 vote.

Democrats Pick Long of Louisiana As Senate Whip

They Delay Fights on Plans To Expand Steering Panel And to Block Filibusters

House Curbs Its Rules Unit

By a WALL STREET JOURNAL Staff Reporter

WASHINGTON — Senate Democrats chose Russell Long of Louisiana to be their assistant majority leader and put off a battle over a proposal to enlarge the steering committee, which makes assignments to other committees. A fight on the Senate floor over curbing filibusters was also delayed until tomorrow.

On the other side of the Capitol, Democratic leaders persuaded the House to accept a mild set of procedural reforms curbing part of the Rules Committee's power to block legislation.

Sen. Long's surprisingly easy victory in the contest for assistant majority leader, or whip, dampened hopes of some filibuster opponents that they can amend Senate Rule 22 to make it easier to end debate. "From a purely tactical standpoint, it doesn't change things much," one said. "But as an indication of the present mood of the Senate, it's a bad omen. Not many of those who voted for Long can be very enthusiastic about reforms designed to promote the Administration's program."

The first step in the biennial filibuster battle was taken when Sen. Anderson (D., N.M.) formally put the Senate on notice that he will introduce a Rule 22 amendment tomorrow. His proposal would permit three-fifths of Senators present to halt a filibuster; to carry, a motion for cloture currently requires two-thirds support of those present.

Antifilibuster Tactics

Antifilibuster forces believe their chances will be best if they can put off a decision until Vice President-elect Humphrey is inaugurated and becomes presiding officer of the Senate. This could be accomplished by engaging in delaying tactics, by a Southern filibuster or by referral of the resolution of the Rules Committee with instructions to report it to the Senate floor on some specific date after Jan. 20.

At any time the resolution is before the Senate, however, a motion may be made to table it. If the motion carries, the issue will be dead. Southerners have given every indication they will employ all the means at their disposal, including a filibuster if necessary, to keep Rule 22 as it is.

Sen. Long narrowly missed election on the first secret ballot of the Democratic conference, when he received 34 of the 35 votes needed. Sen. Pastore of Rhode Island obtained 20 and Sen. Monroney of Oklahoma, 14. Under rules adopted by the caucus, the low man, Sen. Monroney, was eliminated after the first ballot. In the second round, Sen. Long added 7 votes for a total of 41. Sen. Pastore had 25, and 2 write-in votes were cast for Sen. Hart of Michigan, who had refused to become a formal candidate.

Long Was Front-Runner

A 46-year-old veteran of 16 years in the Senate, Sen. Long had been regarded as front-runner in the three-man race. Most political observers had seen the outcome as doubtful, however, and had predicted a paper-thin margin for the winner. Sen. Long's first-ballot strength indicated his following included many besides his fellow Southerners, and he was apparently the second choice of most of Sen. Monroney's Southwestern supporters.

The son of the late Huey Long, one-time "Kingfish" of Louisiana politics who served as state governor and U.S. Senator, Sen. Long ran an energetic, skillful campaign. Assured of 21 Southern votes from the start, he traded on his position as heir presumptive to the chairmanship of the powerful Finance Committee and his record as a "populist" liberal in the field of tax and welfare legislation to attract votes from other regions.

Although the Louisianian's voting record was far less in agreement with the Administration's objectives than those of either of his opponents, he benefited greatly from the decision of President Johnson and Majority Leader Mansfield of Montana to remain neutral.

Fight Over Steering Panel

Defeated in the whip contest, Democratic liberals are trying to capture control of the steering committee by adding two Midwesterners, one Easterner and one Westerner to its present 15 members. The committee currently has six elected members from the South, plus Sen. Long as whip and Sen. Smathers of Florida as conference secretary.

Thus the South has absolute control of committee assignments and can, if its representatives wish, pressure junior Senators to vote against amendment of the filibuster rule. The addition of four non-Southerners would make this much more difficult.

In the Democratic conference yesterday, a resolution was offered by Sen. Lausche of Ohio to take away from the South two of its present members. This proposal was supplanted by a resolution of Sen. McNamara (D., Mich.), which would merely add the four non-Southerners. The time consumed by this parliamentary maneuvering, however, made it impossible to take final action. A new meeting to decide the question must await the call of Sen. Mansfield, who said the schedule hasn't yet been determined.

House Rules Changes

Yesterday's changes in the House rules were the first of any importance in several years, but they aren't likely to add much to the already-bright prospects for President Johnson's "Great Society" legislation. Perhaps most significant was the vote by the House on the rules proposal, which displayed the new power made available to Mr. Johnson's House lieutenants by last November's Democratic landslide. Democrats picked up 38 House seats in the election, bringing their total to 295 and cutting the Republicans to 140.

The key roll-call vote came on whether to foreclose amendments to the take-it-or-leave-it package of reforms drafted Saturday at a meeting of all House Democrats. The ban on amendments was adopted, 224 to 201, with most of the freshman Democrats sticking with speaker McCormack of Massachusetts and Majority Leader Albert of Oklahoma.

Though 16 Republicans joined the majority, it was the freshmen who really offset the defection of 78 Democrats, nearly all Southerners, who either wanted to make the rules changes more modest or who regarded the whole thing as a slap at Rules Chairman Smith, the conservative Virginia Democrat who is the informal leader of the Southern bloc. But the Speaker even picked up a smattering of support within Southern ranks.

Congressional 'Reform'

Despite Increased Talk, No Big Changes Are Likely

WASHINGTON — "Reform"—that unassailable word which shelters a multitude of good, bad and ludicrous ideas—is being chanted louder than ever as Congress assembles this week.

As unprecedented as the volume of the chorus, moreover, is the variety of its suggestions for improving Congress' organization and procedures. "If everyone who has a pet project of his own could be persuaded to back a few of the better ones, we could turn this place upside down the first week," declares a Midwestern Senator's aide.

But even if there are a few changes in the way the national legislature does business (the House Rules Committee's power over legislation has already been clipped, and the Senate may alter its rules to make it somewhat easier to end filibusters), no one talks seriously of revolution. The guarded private talk of fervent reform advocates, in fact, suggests their secret hopes are much more modest than their public goals.

"I have the uneasy feeling that most of the extravagant demands were designed to make (President) Johnson look good when he intervenes to toss us a few bones later," admits a member of the House's liberal Democratic Study Group.

Reformers Strengthened

On the surface, it would appear to be no impossible task to rewrite the rule book in favor of easier passage of the Administration's legislative program. The reform-minded Democratic Study Group, for example, figures it has about 165 adherents among the 295 Democrats in the House—and can count on additional support across the aisle. Senate reform forces have been strengthened by the addition of a couple of presumed recruits and by the accession of Vice President-elect Hubert Humphrey to the presiding officer's chair.

But the obstacles to any major action are formidable, and many of their problems are of the reformers' own making. The proliferation of schemes, the divergent pulls of sectional and ideological ties, and personal antipathies all tend to divide and weaken the ranks of those who say Congress should be reformed.

In the House, it's true, the wauld-be reformers did manage to abandon the boldest ideas, decide on a set of limited objectives and attain them. The key change adopted is reimposition of the so-called 21-day rule. This would empower the Speaker to snatch away any measure from the Rules Committee (which must clear all legislation for floor action) after it has idled for three weeks—or even if the committee should decline to clear a bill.

An important number of reform backers, however, place little faith in such a rule—or indeed in any purely procedural change. "I learned long ago that the best Government in the world will collapse in a hurry if you don't have the right people running it," observes Minnesota's Rep. John Blatnik, elected leader of the Democratic Study Group. Hence the group's stated objective is to assault the seniority system head-on by seizing control of party committee assignments through action in the Democratic caucus. That, some leaders of the study group contend, provides a friendlier clime for liberal reforms than the full House—which must pass on rules changes.

How to Do It

These men envision something like this: The Ways and Means Committee, whose Democratic members double as the group for making committee assignments, goes through its usual motions of nominating senior members to head other committees. But when the slate is submitted for ratification, one of the bolder liberals stands and announces, "I move that the name of Howard Smith be stricken from the top place on the list for the committee on rules." A simple majority then easily and quickly disposes of this symbol of Southern obstruction.

"That's the one proposal we've got that really gets to the heart of the matter, and we'd sacrifice all the others to get it," says Rep. Frank Thompson (D., N.J.), who is coordinating the study group's efforts. But it's doubtful he and his colleagues will get the chance to make any such trade. Though liberals in the Democratic caucus seem sure to gain a few more votes in the Ways and Means Committee, too many Congressmen share the views of a deeply committed Senate reform advocate who insists:

"It's hopeless ever to make a frontal attack on seniority. The reply is always that there's no workable alternative, and I'm not sure that's wrong. The answer is to impose rules on the conduct of chairmen which limit them to maintaining order and prevent them from dominating their committees. Then the question of seniority becomes unimportant."

Revival of the 21-day rule is a timid step in that direction in the House, but the Senate is unlikely even to move toward such a goal. About its only hope is for amendment of Rule XXII, which now requires a two-thirds vote of Senators present to cut off a filibuster. The goal is relatively modest, a reduction in the votes needed to three-fifths.

The problem in revising Rule XXII, which has been amended a number of times in the past, is not one of getting the votes but of getting a vote. Because the Senate has been held in the past to be a "continuing body"—whose rules carry over automatically from one Congress to the next—rules change proposals can themselves be filibustered.

No matter how emotionally satisfying a revision of Rule XXII might be, however, the issue this year has become largely symbolic, in the view of many liberals. Passage of the civil rights bill demonstrated that cloture can be invoked when the Senate's determination to act is great enough. And when attention turns to more immediately practical reforms, wide differences in interests begin to appear.

The fact is that reform forces, even with a 10-year-old formal organization like the Democratic Study Group, are anything but monolithic. Loyalties to state delegations, fellow committee members, other less formal groups and even to party leaders may be stronger than their study group ties at times, the liberal body's guiding lights acknowledge. And nothing sharpens these loyalty conflicts like a reform fight.

Chary Eye on Change

Finally, the sometimes exaggerated human weaknesses of men eager to expand or conserve their own political power or influence causes many, both within the reform element and outside, to cast a chary eye on ideas for change. Backers of the caucus review of committee assignments, for example, insist they would try to remove chairmen only when they were guilty of "flagrant abuse" of their powers. But there are those who fear personal ambition may motivate some reformers as much as nobler purposes.

"There are quite a few liberal types on the Rules Committee who would gladly ditch Howard Smith just to get in position to make some of the horse trades he does," says a Democrat sympathetic to reform. Adds a Southerner with senior committee status of his own to protect: "You look at the guys who're carrying the ball against seniority and almost invariably they're out to do their own committee chairman in."

Curiously, in view of the prognosis for only minor reforms in the coming Congressional session, the outlook is considered very good for another proposal which could ultimately truly overturn the Capitol. This is the resolution to be introduced tomorrow by Sen. Mike Monroney (D., Okla.), co-author (as a Congressman) of the 1946 reorganization bill.

Eschewing the word "reform," Sen. Monroney calls for a year-long House-Senate study of ways to "modernize" Congress. But whatever its label, his investigation would take none of the legislature's sacrosanct institutions or practices for granted. If the Oklahoman has his way, seniority, apportionment of committee assignments, Congressional duties and even the time-honored "Tuesday-Thursday Club" would come under the microscope. (The "Tuesday-Thursday Club" is composed of those members, mostly from nearby states, who spend only three days a week in Washington—thus making effective work difficult on Mondays and Fridays.)

If the Monroney proposal is far reaching, however, it is also slow-moving and there are critics who charge its primary immediate effect will be to delay action on pressing problems.

"We don't need to study all this stuff," an eager reform partisan contends. "Everybody who has been around here for one term knows what the difficulties are. We need the will to act, and Mike's proposal furnishes a perfect excuse for delay."

There are others who claim the Monroney approach is too all-inclusive. "He has everything under the sun in there," a liberal staff assistant says. "Worrying about computers for the appropriations committees. Why, they can have computers right now if they want them. That shotgun approach isn't going to get us anywhere. The only way to achieve reform in this place is to fight like hell for attainable goals—one at a time."

Many Ex-Congressmen Can't Find Jobs With Pay, Prestige Wanted

Corporate Post Might Prevent Future Politicking, Some Say; Returning Lawyer Has Fears

By JOSEPH W. SULLIVAN
Staff Reporter of THE WALL STREET JOURNAL

WASHINGTON—What is an ex-Congressman good for?

To the bumper crop of three-score House members and four Senators "retired" by their constituents starting this month, the question is anything but academic. And except for former lawyers going back to home-town practice and half a dozen politician-farmers returning to their land, few have come by an answer easily.

While most of the election casualties report a variety of job offers from outside government, neither the pay nor the prestige, several are frank to say, match what they've grown accustomed to in Washington. And when a more lucrative proposal does come along, it almost inevitably entails an explicit or implied prohibition against further office-seeking—a deterrent for almost any political animal.

"This is without a doubt the most critical turning point in my life," declares a still-youthful House reject with a background in accounting and finance. "I've had some very attractive corporate offers, but all of them would take me away from my home state and out of politics. On the other hand, the sort of job I'd have to take to keep politically active, such as trade association work, holds no appeal for me and gives my wife the creeps."

Adds Iowa's vanquished Rep. John Kyl: "I've been approached about everything from selling insurance to going on the lecture circuit. But the only way I think I'll find satisfaction is to put together a combination of things." The probable fusion: Teaching government at a small Iowa college, television news direction in the evenings and lecturing "on the run."

Seniority Is a Handicap

The very attribute that can most enhance a sitting Congressman's worth—seniority—is proving a handicap to some job-seekers. On account of his age and the deferential treatment to which he's accustomed, the senior lawmaker has a tough time adjusting to other work, say Washington lobbyists, the privately employed group in closest touch with Congress.

"The widespread notion that old war horses from the Capitol all find happy and remunerative new hunting-grounds as lobbyists is without foundation," says the chief Washington representative for a major trade association. "Very few of them have the capacity to adjust to a new role. Most have either gotten muddle-headed or are too much the prima donna to take directions."

Yet Congress continues to nurture the belief that its finest are worth at least four times their $30,000 legislative salaries and would be getting it if they weren't so dedicated to public service. The comedown to reality is sometimes melancholy. "I know a man with more than 20 years' seniority who's sitting downtown in his apartment right now wishing he could land a part-time lobbying job to maintain his Washington base," relates a re-elected colleague. "But he's too proud to go out and ask for one, and so far nobody's offered him anything."

Contrary to Potomac folklore, the great majority of last November's rejects, young and old, are heading back where they came from. One reason is that all but a handful are Republicans who see strong chances for making a political comeback in 1966. Moreover, the Democratic Administration naturally hasn't exerted itself to find spots for many of the Republicans. (However, New York's defeated GOP Sen. Kenneth Keating may well become Ambassador Keating soon, and Colorado's ex-Rep. Donald Brotzman is being plugged by Westerners for a spot on the Civil Aeronautics Board that's reserved for the minority party.)

Among defeated Democrats as well, job paths mostly lead away from Washington. Of the dozen Democrats retired by the voters, only one, ex-Rep. Gillis Long of Louisiana, has signed up with the Administration; he's a legislative liaison man for the antipoverty program.

Head for Home

Several other former Democratic Congressmen, including Carl Elliott of Alabama, Roland Libonati of Illinois and John Lesinski of Michigan, have passed up Administration offers in order to get back home. Mr. Elliott, an outspoken Democratic loyalist who fell victim to a Dixiecrat primary election foe, even spurned offers of support for a $28,500-a-year post as Clerk of the House. He's now practicing law and politics in Jasper, Ala., while Mr. Lesinski is running his family's Detroit lumber yard and Mr. Libonati has reopened a Chicago law office.

As for a well-known former Senator of the same party, Pierre Salinger is back in California. He starts work Friday as an administrative vice president of National General Corp., which runs a movie theater chain and has television interests as well. Its headquarters are in Beverly Hills.

On both sides of the party fence, lawyers appear to have sustained the fewest relocation jolts. Just two days after his election licking, Mr. Brotzman of Colorado was retained as counsel by a group promoting a "research campus" for industry—linked to the University of Colorado—in his home town of Boulder. "I got so enmeshed in the land title and rezoning work that I wasn't even able to get back to Washington to close my Congressional office until the end of November," he recalls.

Similarly, two-term Rep. James Bromwell of Iowa reports a heavy workload at his Cedar Rapids law firm of Nazette & Bromwell and at the insurance, banking and mutual fund holding company of which he's a co-founder and director. "I'm keeping my family in Washington until the four kids complete their school year. But it now looks as if I'll only be getting here for occasional weekends," he says.

"They Needed Me Back"

For almost all the former farmers, the ready solution has been to go back to the soil. Republican Ralph Beerman of Nebraska, for example, has reassumed responsibility for alfalfa dehydrating operations and alfalfa sales on the 2,000-acre cattle feeding, feed grain and fertilizer combine he owns in partnership with five brothers. "When I sat down with my brothers after the election—it was the first real visit we'd had in almost four years—I came to feel that they really needed me back," Mr. Beerman says. "That was pretty important to me just then, you know, feeling needed."

A North Dakota Republican, Don Short, also has returned to the farm. He even managed to save on household moving expenses by purchasing a new farm truck here in Washington, loading on most of his furnishings and hauling them back himself.

The legal and farm fraternities aren't without trepidations, to be sure. "I'd be less than honest if I didn't admit to apprehensions about hanging up my shingle again after a 15-year lapse," acknowledges former GOP Rep. Edgar Chenoweth, who will reopen his law practice in Trinidad, Colo., and "keep politically active" despite his 67 years. Adds an Eastern Republican casualty: "Most of my old legal clients have developed firm ties elsewhere by now. I'm afraid all I'll get initially is sympathy business." And the return to farming holds some concern for Nebraska's Mr. Beerman. "I've tried to keep up with the cattle and feed grains markets since coming to Washington, but even serving as I did on the House Agriculture Committee you miss an awful lot."

Drawing on Experience

The few ex-lawmakers who are staying on in Washington are mainly legislative veterans who figure they're best equipped to make a living here. "After 20 years in Washington, my experience of value is mostly here," reflects another GOP November casualty, Michigan's Rep. George Meader. He will draw on the lessons of 14 years on the House Judiciary Committee and its antitrust subcommittee plus six prior years as a Senate committee counsel to launch a Washington law practice at 57 years of age. But he will maintain an Ann Arbor law office as well, with an eye toward coming back to Congress two years hence.

Only in the case of a few, such as Iowa's Ben Jensen, who are contemplating both political and professional retirement does the tug between Washington and their districts seriously raise the question of which place is really "home." In Mr. Jensen's case, the verdict so far is a stand-off. Recently turned 72—and dean of the defeated Republicans, with 26 years of service—the Iowan has moved his office library and memorabilia to his home back in Exira, population 1,111. But he's kept his Washington apartment and, according to associates, is participating in regular Tuesday-night poker sessions at the Army-Navy Club.

"It would take a lot of talking to get Mrs. Jensen to give up their solarium apartment here, and their daughter is living in the East," relates a long-time Jensen aide. "But Ben's roots are still in Iowa and when they named the town-square park for him the night before this last election, I think they caught his heart as well."

Along with the lawmakers actually defeated for re-election, there are the voluntary departers who chose not to run for one reason or another; many of these face similar readjustment problems. The most famous of the lot, ex-Sen. Barry Goldwater of Arizona, enjoys an investment income that frees him from job worries. He's busying himself with writing his syndicated newspaper column and with active participation in Republican politics, and he's keeping his Washington apartment as well as his home in Phoenix.

The Senate's 'Maggie'

* * * * * *

In a Casual Way, Washington's Magnuson Gets Much Done

By DAN CORDTZ

WASHINGTON—If a Senate poll were taken to pick that clubby group's half-dozen most popular, most influential and most anonymous members, chances are that on all three lists would appear one name:

"Maggie."

That's the way it would be put down on most ballots, too. For to his affectionate colleagues, the full name of Warren G. Magnuson is somehow too stiff to go with his casual, unbuttoned informality. Even after 20 years as Democratic Senator from the state of Washington, he exudes an air of good fellowship that prompts total strangers to call him by his nickname.

Presiding over a public hearing in his bluff, rambling fashion, chewing a big cigar and with his dark-rimmed spectacles slipping down his ruddy nose, he can appear a faintly comic figure. Grammatical slips, mispronunciations and malapropisms are not unknown to him, and he persistently confuses such terms as "balance of trade" and "balance of payments."

If this manner occasionally traps an outsider into taking Sen. Magnuson for less than he is, it doesn't deceive his peers. His name may mean little to the public outside his home state, but within the club it carries unmistakable weight. This point is being proved once more in the case of the proposed law to require health warnings on cigaret packages. The introduction of a Magnuson bill was the signal for two weeks of full-dress hearings which wind up today. If he cares to declare himself, the Senator from Washington will undoubtedly have a great deal to say about whether the final law applies to cigaret advertising as well as package labels.

Sen. Magnuson's official credentials alone guarantee attention to his views. He is chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, whose legislative jurisdiction affects an estimated 90% of the nation's industry and commerce; he is chairman of the Independent Offices subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee, which holds the purse strings of most Federal regulatory agencies; and he is chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, which doles out contributions to colleagues at election time.

Sen. Magnuson also enjoys the special status that goes with long service (he ranks eighth in seniority), a place on the Democratic Policy Committee and membership in the Senate's shadowy inner circle. He is one of the few active remnants of the fading "establishment" which helped Lyndon B. Johnson run the Senate for nearly eight years. The President and Sen. Magnuson, in fact, share a close personal friendship that goes back almost to the day in 1937 when both were sworn into the House of Representatives.

He's not dogmatic or doctrinaire. He can give a little on most things. Some of these birds around here see everything in such categorical terms, they never have any room to maneuver."

Placing Sen. Magnuson within the ideological spectrum is not easy. Both the Americans for Constitutional Action and the Americans for Democratic Action rate him, on his voting record, as a solid liberal. He wears that badge proudly, but adds that he is a conservative in fiscal matters. "I helped cut $6 billion off the Federal budget in the last 10 years," he declares. Some of his friends describe him as an instinctive conservative whose natural bent is tempered by political realism and a soft heart.

Even when he is shepherding an Administration proposal or one of his own through his committee, moreover, Sen. Magnuson is always seeking the sort of consensus so dear to his friend in the White House. And if he finds it impossible to get, he's quite content to let the matter rest until a better day. "We seldom pass a bill in the Commerce Committee that isn't pretty well agreed on," he remarks.

No Arm-Twister

Nor is such agreement the grudging result of any arm-twisting on his part. The chairman of a Senate committee enjoys broad power, and more than one has been known to use it tyranically at times. But not the senior Senator from Washington. His permissiveness makes the public hearings of the Commerce Committee the most relaxed in town. It encourages many members to indulge their penchant for comedy, and occasionally reduces the time schedule to a shambles. Once the doors are closed on executive sessions, committee members say, their chairman is brisker, but never domineering.

So adroitly has Sen. Magnuson steered clear of controversy that he has really only been embroiled in a couple of bitter, knockdown battles. One was the dispute over construction of a multi-purpose dam in Idaho's Hells Canyon in 1956 and the other was the 1959 wrangle over Senate confirmation of Admiral Lewis Strauss as Secretary of Commerce. (Sen. Magnuson suffered one of his infrequent defeats when the big dam was rejected in favor of two low-level dams, but he was on the winning side as Adm. Strauss was retired to private life.)

When he is forced into line of fire, Sen. Magnuson usually emerges magically unscathed. He pushed the public accommodations section of the civil rights bill and the communications satellite bill through his committee without alienating either the Southerners violently opposed to the first or the liberals adamantly against the second. Second-ranking committee Democrat John O. Pastore of Rhode Island, on the other hand, was raked from both sides and lost the election for assistant majority leader partly as a result.

President Was Best Man

"We came here together, went to war together and came back together," the Senator declares proudly. He modestly omits the fact that the President served as best man last year when Sen. Magnuson married Mrs. Jermaine Peralta, a Seattle widow.

More important than official rank and highly placed friends, though, is the all but universal fondness felt for Sen. Magnuson by men of the most diverse political persuasion. Conservative Sen. Carl Hayden (D., Ariz.), who has spent 38 years in the chamber, labels him "a Senator's Senator." (One popular definition: "A man who, if he can't help you win, helps you look good losing.") Majority Leader Mike Mansfield of Montana declares, "Maggie doesn't have an enemy on either side of the aisle." Adds liberal Democrat Phil Hart of Michigan: "He's just one of the really nice guys in this place."

A psychiatrist might contend the 60-year-old Senator's desire for friendship reflects a childhood insecurity. Orphaned at the age of three weeks, he was adopted by a Swedish family in Minnesota. But at the age of 17, he worked his way West — riding freight trains and doing farm labor — until he reached Seattle. Seven years later, he had worked his way through the University of Washington and its law school and in 1933 won his first election, to the state legislature. Since then he has been in 23 more and won them all, although he received the scare of his life in 1962 when an unknown minister came within 45,000 votes of turning him out of his Senate seat.

Like many of those in the Senate, Sen. Magnuson seems to find most of his pleasure in the company of his fellow club members. He plays poker with a Congressional group almost every Thursday night, attends football and baseball games with Sen. Richard Russell of Georgia. A good companion, he is fond of telling funny stories about his fellow Scandinavians. Before his marriage, he was one of the capital's gayer bachelors; now he spends most evenings reading and works at painting on the weekends. He is an unabashed sentimentalist, a quality that endears him to his frequently thick-skinned Senate mates.

But popularity on Capitol Hill is more than a matter of being a pleasant, amusing "nice guy." To get along, goes the proverb, go along. And Sen. Magnuson tries hard to help his colleagues wherever possible. Some outside critics suggest he is a bit too accommodating and even something of a "wheeler-dealer." But the most sternly moralistic among his fellow Senators deny there is anything sinister about his horse-trading.

"Maggie wouldn't compromise with principle," one realistic Senate veteran says, "but he's not one of those fellows who looks for a moral issue in every little political proposal.

But his fellow Senators don't just like Sen. Magnuson, they trust him. "Everybody knows Maggie's not out to do anybody in." explains a colleague of years' standing. "He has no further political ambitions, so he's not trying to take anything away from somebody else. All he wants is to be liked." This attitude, plus his acceptability to LBJ and the Senate's elders, was responsible for Sen. Magnuson's selection (over then-Sen. Hubert Humphrey) as head of the Senatorial Campaign Committee.

As they trust his good faith, moreover, Sen. Magnuson's colleagues also trust his instincts and judgment. "I doubt," asserts a strong liberal, "that Maggie ever read the civil rights bill clear through. He doesn't have a mind that focuses on detail and niceties. But he came down hard on the right side." And if he is no deep thinker, he is also far from ill-informed where his own legislative specialties are concerned.

Reliance on Staffs

He relies heavily on personal and committee staffs whose abilities are acknowledged by Democratic and Republican members alike. (So many persons work for Sen. Magnuson directly or indirectly that one long corridor of the Senate Office Building is known as "Maggie's Alley.") And unlike many in Congress, he does not spread himself thin. He specializes in his committee's concerns, with particular interest in fisheries, merchant marine and the like which mean bread and butter to his home state.

It's a rare Senator, therefore, who can bring himself to turn Sen. Magnuson down when he entreats support. "He'll go to a fellow like John Stennis, for example, and tell him how desperately the Pacific fishing industry needs help," says an admiring associate. "Stennis won't give a damn one way or another, but Maggie will be so earnest and so determined that he'll figure if Maggie feels that strongly about it he must be right. Anyway, the demand is never outrageous and it never involves taking something away from somebody else. If Maggie usually gets what he wants, it's because he usually wants what he can get."

Nonetheless, his modest goals have resulted in such legislative plums as a $10 million Federal grant for the 1962 Seattle world's fair; a chain of dams along the Columbia and Snake rivers; and an amendment to the Food for Peace program adding fish to the surplus foods which can be sold to foreign countries under special, easy terms. (The only fish currently in surplus in the U.S. just happens to be pink salmon, most of which is caught and canned in the Pacific Northwest.) And Washington, 23rd state in population, collects one of every six Federal public works dollars.

Many of his contributions, his admirers say, go unnoticed because Sen. Magnuson avoids attracting attention. In fact, his manner of operating may have been best described by President Kennedy when he spoke at a 1961 dinner honoring Sen. Magnuson's 25th anniversary in Congress.

"Most members of the Senate," President Kennedy said, "have developed the art of speaking with precision and clarity and force. The secret of Sen. Magnuson's meteoric career has been the reverse. He may make clear speeches to you on great public occasions, but in Washington he speaks in the Senate so quietly that few can hear him. He looks down at his desk—he comes into the Senate late in the afternoon—he is very hesitant about interrupting other members of the Senate—when he rises to speak, most members of the Senate have left—he sends his messages up to the Senate and everyone says, 'What is it?' and Sen. Magnuson says, 'It's nothing important.' And Grand Coulee Dam is built."

ROOM 140
CANNON HOUSE OFFICE BLDG.
TEL.: 225-6168

Dear Sir:

One of the great political challenges of our times is presented by the much-discussed but long-delayed election and campaign contribution reform legislation.

At the present time, there appears to be general agreement that a serious need for such legislation exists and that something should be done. We have had a message from President Johnson to this effect and there have been a number of excellent studies and reports on this subject. Also, a special Commission on Campaign Contributions was appointed by President Kennedy, and in 1962 the report of this Commission sparked the introduction of several bills.

Now, after much fanfare and the introduction of an Administration bill, there is an evident reluctance on the part of the Democratic majority in Congress even to hold hearings.

In order to keep this important legislation moving forward, the Republican leadership in the House of Representatives have prepared and introduced the enclosed election reform bill. This bill, as the explanation indicates, accepts a number of the President's proposals but it also contains significant improvements and additions. We are still hopeful that meaningful legislation can be enacted this year. Certainly, such legislation is imperative before the 1968 Presidential campaign. However, if this is to be accomplished, we will have to have the support and assistance of an aroused electorate.

We would appreciate receiving comments and suggestions regarding this bill. Undoubtedly, additional improvements and refinements will be required. Your observations and assistance would be most helpful as the consideration of this legislation continues.

Sincerely yours,

John J. Rhodes

ELECTION REFORM LEGISLATION

(Mr. LIPSCOMB (at the request of Mr. CLARENCE J. BROWN, JR.) was granted permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

Mr. LIPSCOMB. Mr. Speaker, the need for election reform legislation is becoming more apparent with every passing day. Campaign contributions and campaign expenditures are intimately connected with the election process. When one is subject to question, there is an immediate reflection upon the other. Recently, we have witnessed a number of disclosures regarding the President's Club. Although this group is generally shrouded in mystery, it is now apparent that it is the major source for campaign funds for the Democratic Party. However, many of the contributions received by this club apparently were not required to be reported to the Clerk of the House of Representatives under the present laws. In commenting on this, the study entitled "Financing the 1964 Election" by the Citizens' Research Foundation of Princeton, N.J., stated:

> Using an old practice of secreting funds in certain states, where they need not be reported in Washington under common interpretations of federal law, Democratic leaders will not divulge how much more was raised or spent—though they admit to some. And state reporting requirements are so varied and loose that the complete picture cannot be known.
> The Democratic reports filed in Washington failed to reflect fully certain Democratic funds raised through $1000-a-year-memberships in the President's Clubs of New York and California, and the national share of a series of $100-a-plate dinners addressed by President Johnson in several states. The President's Clubs of New York and California did not file reports in Washington though sizeable portions of their funds were transferred to committees which did report as required by federal law. But national shares of funds in California, Michigan, Minnesota and perhaps other states were left in the states to be expended in those states for the presidential campaign at the command of the dnc. Thus they were never reported in Washington and are not included in our totals.

In order to correct this and a number of other problems associated with our present election laws, I, together with the Republican leadership in the House of Representatives, have introduced an election reform bill. This bill—H.R. 16203—would make the following changes and modifications in our present laws with respect to campaign contributions and expenditures.

First. Require every candidate for Federal office and every committee—State, interstate, or national—that supports a candidate for Federal office, to report in detail on every contribuiton and every expenditure over $100.

A five-member Federal Election Commission would be established to receive and maintain the required reports and statements.

Second. Require the reporting of all gifts of over $100 received by decision-making officials of the executive department and Members of Congress for themselves, their wives and minor children—excluding gifts from a spouse, child, parent, grandparent, brother or sister—and all income from any source other than the Government for personal services received by such person or on his behalf—including salary, bonuses, fees, commissions, honorariums, and expenses paid or reimbursed.

In addition, individuals seeking election to the House of Representatives and to the Senate would be required to file a report disclosing the gifts and income received in the 12 months prior to the date they became candidates.

Third. Provide a special tax deduction in an amount up to $100, for contributions to any candidate or to any organizations supporting a candidate, in any election campaign or primary—Federal, State, or local. This deduction would be allowed in addition to the standard deduction and would not be limited to those who itemize their deductions.

Fourth. Limit to $5,000 the total amount that could come from any single source to the campaign of any candidate.

Fifth. Permit the sale of campaign souvenirs at prices not exceeding $5. These would become the only items of any kind—including advertising—that any candidate or committee would be permitted to sell in order to raise campaign funds.

Sixth. Repeal present ceilings on total expenditures by candidates for Federal offices.

Seventh. Prohibit political contributions in Federal elections by corporations, firms, or individuals contracting with the United States—if the contract is more than $100,000—and by any labor organization that is recognized as the collective bargaining representative of such contractor.

Eighth. Bring primary elections, conventions, and party caucuses under the reporting and disclosure provisons.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to insert a copy of the election reform bill, H.R. 16203, and a copy of an explanatory statement which I presented to the Subcommittee on Elections of the House Administration Committee.

H.R. 16203

A bill to revise the Federal election laws, and for other purposes

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Election Reform Act of 1966".

TITLE I—AMENDMENTS TO CRIMINAL CODE

SEC. 101. Section 591 of title 18 of the United States Code is amended to read as follows:

"§ 591. Definitions

"When used in sections 597, 599, 602, 608, 610, and 611 of this title—

"(a) The term 'election' means a general, special, or primary election, and includes a convention, or caucus of a political party held to nominate a candidate;

"(b) The term 'candidate' means an individual who seeks nomination or election as President or Vice President of the United States, Senator or Representative in, or Resident Commissioner to, the Congress of the United States, whether or not such individual is elected. For purposes of this paragraph, an individual shall be deemed to seek nomination or election if he (1) has taken the action necessary under the law of a State to qualify him for nomination for election, or for election, to the office of President or Vice President of the United States, to the office of Senator or Representative in, or Resident Commissioner to, the Congress of the United States, or, (2) has received contributions or made expenditures, or has given his consent for any other person to receive contributions or make expenditures, with a view to bringing about his nomination for election, or election, to such office;

"(c) The term 'political committee' includes any candidate, committee, association, or organization which accepts contributions or makes expenditures for the purpose of influencing or attempting to influence the election of a candidate, or presidential and vice-presidential electors;

"(d) The term 'contribution' includes a gift, donation, payment or loan of money, or anything of value, made for the purpose of influencing or attempting to influence the election of a candidate, or presidential and vice-presidential electors, and includes a transfer of funds between political committees;

"(e) The term 'expenditure' includes a purchase, payment or loan of money, or anything of value, made for the purpose of influencing or attempting or influence the election of a candidate, or presidential and vice-presidential electors, and includes a transfer of funds between political committees."

SEC. 102. Section 608 of title 18 of the United States Code is amended to read as follows:

"§ 608. Limitations on political contributions and purchases

"(a) Whoever, other than a political committee, directly or indirectly, makes contributions in an aggregate amount in excess of $5,000 during any calendar year, to any candidate or presidential and vice-presidential elector in connection with any campaign for his nomination or election or to any political committee whose activities are primarily in support of such candidate or such elector, shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both.

"(b) Whoever, being a candidate, political committee, or national political committee, sells to anyone other than a candidate, political committee, or national political commitee, any goods, commodities, advertising, or articles of any kind, or any services, shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both.

"(c) Whoever, other than a candidate, political committee or national political committee, buys from a candidate, political committee or national political committee, any goods, commodities, advertising, or articles of any kind, or any services, shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both.

"(d) Subsections (b) and (c) shall not apply to the sale or purchase of political campaign pins, buttons, badges, flags, emblems, hats, banners, and similar campaign souvenirs for prices not exceeding $5 each. Such purchases shall be deemed contributions under subsection (a). Subsections (b) and (c) shall not interfere with the usual and known business, trade or profession of any candidate or with a normal arm's-length transaction.

"(e) In all cases of violations of this section by a partnership, committee, association, corporation, or other organization or group of persons, the officers, directors, or managing heads thereof who knowingly and willfully participate in such violation shall be punished as herein provided."

SEC. 103. Section 609 of title 18 of the United States Code is repealed.

SEC. 104. Section 611 of title 18 of the United States Code is amended to read as follows:

"§ 611. Contributions by Government contractors, certain labor organizations, and other related organizations

"(a) Whoever, including a corporation, enters into any contract with the United States or any department or agency thereof, requiring payments from the United States in excess of $100,000, either for the rendition of personal services or furnishing any material, supplies, or equipment to the United States or any department or agency thereof, or selling any land or building to the United States or any department or agency thereof, if payment for the performance of such contract or payment for such material, supplies, equipment, land, or building is to be made in whole or in part from funds appropriated by the Congress, during the period of negotiation for, or performance under such contract or furnishing of material, supplies, equipment, land or buildings, directly or indirectly makes any contribution, or promises expressly or impliedly to make any contribution; or

"(b) Whoever, being a labor organization lawfully recognized as the collective bargaining representative of the employees of any person (including a corporation) to whom the preceding paragraph applies, directly or indirectly makes any contribution, or promises expressly or impliedly to make any contribution; or

"(c) Whoever, being an organization or association that is sponsored, directed, assisted or supported directly or indirectly by a corporation or a labor organization, to whom subsection (a) or (b) applies, directly or indirectly makes any contribution, or promises expressly or impliedly to make any contribution; or

"(d) whoever knowingly solicits any contribution from any such person, during any such period—

"Shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than five years or both."

SEC. 105. So much of the sectional analysis at the beginning of chapter 29 of title 18 of the United States Code as relates to sections 609 and 611 is amended to read:

"609. Repealed.

"611. Contributions by Government contractors, certain labor organizations, and other related organizations."

TITLE II—DISCLOSURE OF FEDERAL CAMPAIGN FUNDS

Definitions

SEC. 201. When used in this title—

(a) The term "election" means a general, special, or primary election, and includes a convention, or caucus of a political party held to nominate a candidate;

(b) The term "candidate" means an individual who seeks nomination or election as President or Vice President of the United States, Senator or Representative in, or Resident Commissioner to, the Congress of the United States, whether or not such individual is elected. For purposes of this paragraph, an individual shall be deemed to seek nomination or election if he (1) has taken the action necessary under the law of a State to qualify him for nomination for election, or for election, to the office of President or Vice President of the United States, to the office of Senator or Representative in, or Resident Commissioner to, the Congress of the United States, or, (2) has received contributions or made expenditures, or has given his consent for any other person to receive contributions or make expenditures, with a view to bringing about his nomination for election, or election, to such office;

(c) The term "political committee" includes any candidate, committee, association, or organization which accepts contributions or makes expenditures for the purpose of influencing or attempting to influence the election of a candidate, or presidential and vice-presidential electors;

(d) The term "contribution" includes a gift, donation, payment or loan of money, or any thing of value, made for the purpose of influencing or attempting to influence the election of a candidate, or presidential and vice-presidential electors, and includes a transfer of funds between political committees;

(e) The term "expenditure" includes a purchase, payment, or loan of money, or anything of value, made for the purpose of influencing or attempting to influence the election of a candidate, or presidential and vice-presidential electors, and includes a transfer of funds between political committees.

Federal Elections Commission

SEC. 202. (a) There is hereby created a commission to be known as the Federal Elections Commission, which shall be composed of five members, not more than three of whom shall be members of the same political party, who shall be appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. One of the original members shall be appointed for a term of two years, one for a term of four years, one for a term of six years, one for a term of eight years, and one for a term of ten years, beginning from the date of enactment of this title, but their successors shall be appointed for terms of ten years each, except that any individual chosen to fill a vacancy shall be appointed only for the unexpired term of the member whom he shall succeed. The President shall designate one member to serve as Chairman of the Commission, and one member to serve as Vice Chairman. The Chairman shall be responsible on behalf of the Commission for the administrative operations of the Commission, and shall appoint, in accordance with the civil service laws, such officers, agents, attorneys, and employees as it deems necessary to assist it in the performance of its functions and to fix their compensation in accordance with the Classification Act of 1949, as amended. The Vice Chairman shall act as Chairman in the absence or disability of the Chairman or in the event of a vacancy in that office.

(b) A vacancy in the Commission shall not impair the right of the remaining members to exercise all the powers of the Commission and three members thereof shall constitute a quorum.

(c) The Commission shall have an official seal which shall be judicially noticed.

(d) The Commission shall at the close of each fiscal year report to the Congress and to the President concerning the action it has taken; the names, salaries, and duties of all individuals in its employ and the money's it has disbursed; and shall make such further reports on the matters within its jurisdiction and such recommendations for further legislation as may appear desirable.

(e)(1) Section 303(c) of the Federal Executive Salary Act of 1964 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"(47) Chairman, Federal Elections Board."

(2) Section 303(d) of such Act is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"(70) Members, Federal Elections Board."

(f) The principal office of the Commission shall be in or near the District of Columbia, but it may meet or exercise any or all its powers at any other place.

(g) All officers, agents, attorneys, and employees of the Commission shall be subject to the provisions of section 9 of the Act of August 2, 1939, as amended (the Hatch Act), notwithstanding any exemption contained in such section.

Treasurer of political committee; duties of treasurer

SEC. 203. (a) Every political committee shall have a treasurer. No contribution shall be accepted, and no expenditure made, by or on behalf of a political committee for the purpose of influencing an election until such treasurer has been chosen. It shall be the duty of the treasurer to keep the contributions received by or for a committee in a special account separate from any personal or other funds.

(b) It shall be the duty of the treasurer of a political committee to keep a detailed and exact account of—

(1) All contributions made to or for such committee;

(2) The name and address of every person making any such contribution, and the date thereof;

(3) All expenditures made by or on behalf of such committee, including the name and address of every person to whom any such expenditure is made, and the date thereof.

(c) It shall be the duty of the treasurer to obtain and keep a receipted bill, stating the particulars, for every expenditure by or on behalf of a political committee exceeding $100 in amount. The treasurer shall preserve all receipted bills and accounts required to be kept by this section for a period of at least two years from the date of the filing of the statement containing such items.

Accounts of contributions received

SEC. 204. Every person who receives a contribution for a political committee shall, on demand of the treasurer, and in any event within five days after the receipt of such contribution, render to the treasurer a detailed account thereof, including the name and address of the person making such contribution, and the date on which received.

Statements filed with the Commission

SEC. 205. (a) The treasurer of a political committee supporting a candidate or candidates for nomination or election as President or Vice President of the United States, Senator, or Representtive in, or Resident Commissioner to, the Congress of the United States shall file with the Commission between the 1st and 10th days of March, June, and September, in each year, and also between the 10th and 15th days, and on the 5th day, next preceding the date on which an election is to be held, and also by the 31st day of January, a statement, upon forms prescribed by the Commission, containing, complete as of the day next preceding the date of filing—

(1) The name and address of each person who has made a contribution to or for such committee in one or more items of the aggregate amount or value, within the calendar year, of $100 or more, together with the amount and date of such contribution;

(2) The total sum of the contributions made to or for such committee during the calendar year and not stated under paragraph (1);

(3) The total sum of any contributions made to or for such committee during the calendar year;

(4) The name and address of each person to whom an expenditure in one or more items of the aggregate amount or value, within the calendar year, of $100 or more has been made by or on behalf of such committee, and the amount, date, and purpose of such expenditure;

(5) The total sum of all expenditures made by or on behalf of such committee during the calendar year and not stated under paragraph (4);

(6) The total sum of all expenditures made by or on behalf of such committee during the calendar year.

(b) The statements required to be filed by subsection (a) of this section shall be cumulative during the calendar year to which they relate; but where there has been no change in an item reported in a previous statement, only the amount need be carried forward.

Statements by others than political committee filed with the Commission

SEC. 206. Every person (other than a political committee) who makes an expenditure in one or more items, other than by contribution to a political committee, aggregating $100 or more within a calendar year for the purpose of influencing the election of a candidate, shall file with the Commission an itemized detailed statement of such expenditure in the same manner as required of the treasurer of a political committee by section 205 of this title.

Duties of the Commission

SEC. 207. It shall be the duty of the Commission—

(1) to develop prescribed forms for the making of the reports and statements required by this title and title III of this Act;

(2) to prepare and publish a manual setting forth recommended uniform methods of bookkeeping and reporting for use by persons required to make reports and statements required by this title and title III of this Act;

(3) to develop a filing, coding, and cross-indexing system consonant with the purposes of this Act;

(4) to make the reports and statements filed with it available for public inspection and copying during regular office hours, commencing not later than five days after their receipt and to make copying facilities available;

(5) to preserve such reports and statements for a period of ten years from date of receipt;

(6) to prepare and publish, within ten working days after the due dates of the semi-annual, April and postconvention reports and within seven calendar days after the due dates of the preconvention and preelection reports required by this title, summaries of the respective reports received; such summaries shall contain, in addition to such other information as the Commission may determine, compilations disclosing the total receipts and expenditures appearing in each report required by this title by categories of amounts as he shall determine, and shall also include the name and address, and amount of contribution of each person, listed alphabetically, shown to have contributed the sum of $250 or more; and such summaries shall be grouped according to candidates and parties;

(7) to prepare and publish an annual report including compilations of (A) total reported contributions and expenditures for all candidates, political committees, and other persons during the year; (B) total amounts expended according to such categories as the Commission shall determine and broken down into candidate, party, and nonparty expenditures on the National, State, and local levels; (C) total amounts expended for influencing nominations and elections stated separately; (D) total amounts contributed according to such categories of amounts as the Commission shall determine and broken down into contributions on the National, State, and local levels for candidates and political committees; and (E) aggregate amounts contributed by any contributor shown to have contributed the sum of $250 or more;

(8) to prepare and publish from time to time special reports comparing the various totals and categories of contributions and expenditures made in preceding election years;

(9) to prepare and publish such other reports as he may deem appropriate;

(10) to assure wide dissemination of summaries and reports;

(11) to make from time to time audits and field investigations with respect to reports and statements filed under the provisions of this title and title III of this Act, and with respect to alleged failures to file any report or statement required under the provisions of this title or title III of this Act;

(12) to report suspected violations of law to the appropriate law enforcement authorities;

(13) to prescribe suitable procedural regulations to carry out the provisions of this title and title III of this Act; and

(14) for the purpose of any audit or investigation provided for in paragraph (11) of this section, the provisions of sections 9 and 10 of the Federal Trade Commission Act (15 U.S.C. 49, 50) are hereby made applicable to the jurisdiction, powers, and duties of the Commission, or any officer designated by it, except that the attendance of a witness may not be required outside of the State where he is found, resides, or transacts business, and the production of evidence may not be required outside the State where such evidence is kept.

Statements; verification; filing

SEC. 208. Statements required to be filed with the Commission—

(a) shall be verified by the oath or affirmation of the person filing such statement, taken before any officer authorized to administer oaths; and

(b) shall be deemed properly filed when deposited in an established post office within the prescribed time, duly stamped, registered, and directed to the Commission, at Washington, District of Columbia; but in the event it is not received, a duplicate of such statement shall be promptly filed.

Penalty for violations

SEC. 209. Any person who violates any of the provisions of this title shall be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned not more than one year, or both.

State laws not affected

SEC. 210. This title shall not be construed to annul the laws of any State relating to the nomination or election of candidates, unless directly inconsistent with the provisions of this title, or to exempt any candidate from complying with such State laws.

Partial invalidity

SEC. 211. If any provision of this title, or the application thereof, to any person or circumstance is held invalid, the validity of the remainder of said title and the application of such provision to other persons and circumstances shall not be affected thereby.

SEC. 212. The Federal Corrupt Practices Act, 1925, and all other Acts or parts of Acts inconsistent herewith are repealed.

TITLE III—DISCLOSURE OF GIFTS AND CERTAIN COMPENSATION

Definitions

SEC. 301. When used in this title—

(a) The term "income" shall mean all compensation for personal services, including (but not limited to) salary, bonuses, fees, commissions, honorariums, and expenses paid or reimbursed, whether in the form of money or anything of value, from any source other than the Government of the United States.

(b) The term "Representative" shall mean each Representative in, or Resident Commissioner to, the Congress of the United States.

(c) The term "Federal executive" means a person holding an office the compensation of which is prescribed in the Federal Executive Salary Schedule.

(d) The term "candidate" means an individual who (1) has taken the action necessary under the law of a State to qualify him for nomination for election, or for election, to the office of Senator or Representative in, or Resident Commissioner to, the Congress of the United States, or, (2) has received contributions or made expenditures, or has given his consent for any other person to receive contributions or make expenditures, with a view to bringing about his nomination for election, or election, to such office.

Statement of gifts to be filed

SEC. 302. (a) Each United States Senator, each Representative, and each Federal executive shall file with the Commission by the 31st day of January a statement disclosing gifts of money or things of value, except contributions as defined in section 201(d) of title II of this Act, received by him, his wife or minor children, or on his or their behalf during the preceding calendar year or portion thereof during which he held office, containing—

(1) The name and address of each donor from whom he, his wife or minor children received, or from whom there was received on his or their behalf, one or more gifts of money of an aggregate amount of $100 within the calendar year, together with the amount and date of such gifts;

(2) The name and address of each donor from whom he, his wife or minor children received, or from whom there was received on his or their behalf one or more gifts other than money of an aggregate value estimated by the donee of $100 or more within the calendar year, together with the date and identity of such gifts; and

(3) The total sum of gifts of money received by him, his wife or minor children, or on his or their behalf, during the calendar year and not stated under paragraph (1).

Gifts from a spouse, child, parent, grandparent, brother, or sister need not be disclosed under this section.

(b) Each candidate shall by the thirtieth day after he becomes a candidate, file with the Commission a statement disclosing the information with respect to gifts required by subsection (a) for the twelve-calendar-month period preceding the month during which he became a candidate.

Statement of compensation to be filed

SEC. 303. (a) Each United States Senator, each Representative, and each Federal executive shall file with the Commission by the 31st day of January a statement disclosing income received by him or on his behalf during the preceding calendar year or portion thereof during which he held office, containing—

(1) the name and address of each person from whom he or anyone on his behalf received any such income; the amount or, if not money, the identity and value thereof; and the name and address of each person for whom such service was performed; and

(2) a description of the service performed.

(b) Each candidate shall, by the thirtieth day after the day he became a candidate, file with the Commission a statement containing the information with respect to income required by subsection (a) for the twelve-calendar-month period preceding the month during which he became a candidate.

Statements; verification; filing

SEC. 304. Statements required to be filed with the Commission—

(a) shall be verified by the oath or affirmation of the person filing such statement, taken before any officer authorized to administer oaths; and

TITLE IV—AMENDMENTS TO INTERNAL REVENUE CODE OF 1954

Income tax deduction

SEC. 401. (a) Part VII of subchapter B of chapter 1 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to additional itemized deductions for individuals) is amended by renumbering section 218 as 219, and by inserting after section 217 the following new section:

"Sec. 218. Political contributions.

"(a) ALLOWANCE OF DEDUCTION.—In the case of an individual, there shall be allowed as a deduction an amount equal to so much of the political contributions as does not exceed $100, payment of which is made by the taxpayer within the taxable year, except that in the case of a joint return of a husband and wife under section 6013 the deductions shall not exceed $100, and in the case of a separate return by a married individual the deduction shall not exceed $50.

"(b) VERIFICATION.—The deduction under subsection (a) shall be allowed, with respect to any political contribution, only if such political contribution is verified in such manner as the Secretary or his delegate shall prescribe by regulations.

"(c) DEFINITION OF POLITICAL CONTRIBUTION.—For purposes of this section the term 'political contribution' means a gift or donation to—

"(1) any committee, association, or organization (whether incorporated or not) organized and operated exclusively for the purpose of influencing or attempting to influence the election of one or more individuals qualified by law to seek any public office; or

"(2) an individual who is qualified by law as a candidate for any Federal, State, or local elective public office in any general, special, or primary election, or in any convention of an organization described in subparagraph (1), for use by such individual to further his candidacy.

"(3) an individual shall be deemed qualified by law to seek any public office or qualified by law as a candidate for any public office if such individual, or the organization supporting the election of such individual, has taken the action necessary under the applicable law to have his name placed on the ballot for the election to fill such office or to become a candidate for such office.

"(d) CROSS REFERENCE.—

"For disallowance of deduction to estates and trusts, see section 642(i)."

(b) The table of sections for such part VII is amended by striking out the last item and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"Sec. 218. Political contributions.

"Sec. 219. Cross references."

(c) Section 62 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to definition of adjusted gross income) is amended by inserting after paragraph (S) the following paragraph:

"(9) POLITICAL CONTRIBUTIONS.—The deduction allowed by section 218."

(d) Section 276(a) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to certain indirect contributions to political parties) is amended by striking out "No deduction otherwise allowable under this chapter" and inserting in lieu thereof "Except as provided in section 218, no deduction otherwise allowable under this chapter."

(e) Section 642 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to special rules for credits and deductions for estates and trusts) is amended by redesignating subsection (i) and (j), and by inserting after subsection (h) the following new subsection:

"(i) POLITICAL CONTRIBUTIONS.—An estate or trust shall not be allowed the deduction for political contributions provided by section 218."

TITLE V—EFFECTIVE DATE

SEC. 501. This Act shall take effect January 2, 1967, except that the amendments made by title IV shall apply to taxable years ending after December 31, 1966, but only with respect to political contributions payment of which is made after December 31, 1966.

STATEMENT ON ELECTION REFORM LEGISLATION BY GLENARD P. LIPSCOMB, REPUBLICAN, OF CALIFORNIA, RANKING REPUBLICAN OF THE HOUSE ADMINISTRATION COMMITTEE, BEFORE THE SUBCOMMITTEE ON ELECTIONS OF THE HOUSE ADMINISTRATION COMMITTEE

Mr. Chairman, I support and urge the adoption of appropriate election reform legislation during this session of Congress. Such reforms are long overdue. The presently scheduled hearings before the Subcommittee on Elections of the House Administration Committee should be expedited but they must be thorough and complete. Even at this late date, election reform legislation can be enacted this year. Certainly, I will do everything I can to see to it that this is accomplished.

Unfortunately, the Administration bill has a number of serious defects. For example, it would continue the present unsatisfactory practice of having the reports of contributions and campaign expenditures filed with the Clerk of the House and the Secretary of the Senate. Conventions and party caucuses are left uncovered although such activities call for major contributions and expenditures. Political contributions by labor unions and their closely-related organizations are totally ignored, even though it is generally agreed that the present laws that relate to such contributions are completely inadequate. Also, the gift and income filing requirements do not apply to the policy-making officials of the Executive Department.

In order to correct these and other defects, I, together with the House Republican leadership, have introduced a bill that contains the following important additions and improvements:

1. FEDERAL ELECTIONS COMMISSION

The Republican bill would establish a five-member Federal Elections Commission to receive and maintain the required reports and statements. The Commission would be appointed by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate. The Commissioners would serve for a ten-year term and not more than three could be from the same political party. The Commisioners would have the authority to develop forms for the making of reports and statements required by this Act and to prepare and publish a manual setting forth a recomemnded and uniform method of bookkeeping and reporting for use by persons required to make reports. The reports and statements filed would be available for public inspection and copy, and, on a regular basis, summaries of the reports received would be published. In addition, the Commission would have the authority to make audits and field investigations with respect to reports and statements filed under the provisions of this Act and with respect to alleged failures to file. Also, it would be authorized to issue subpoenas and to report suspected violations of the law to the appropriate law enforcement officers. (Title II)

I believe it would be a mistake to establish the Clerk of the House of Representatives and the Seretary of the Senate as the offices that would receive the detailed reports of contributions and campaign expenditures. These offices are not equipped to handle the anticipated avalanche of reports. Moreover, under the present law, reports are now filed in these offices. It is generally acknowledged that this has not been a successful system. The new provisions and requirements should not be burdened by the discredited procedures of the past.

It would be most unfortunate if the proposed election reforms did not contain adequate and enforceable reporting and disclosure provisions. At the present time, there is widespread cynicism toward the legal regulation of campaign funds. We do not believe that the reporting provisions of the Administration's bill are strong enough to dispel this cynicism and to restore public confidence. Certainly, reporting provisions without adequate enforcement are no answer. Officials who are, in fact, employees of Congress cannot be expected to devote the time or determination that effective administration demands. I believe that the establishment of a bipartisan Elections Commission would correct these obvious deficiencies in the Administration's bill.

2. POLITICAL CONTRIBUTIONS BY BUSINESS AND LABOR

In the Repjublican bill, the prohibition against contributions by government contractors has been expanded to include labor organizations that are recognized as the collective bargaining representatives of the employees of such contractors and all organizations or associations that are directed or financially supported by such labor organizations or such corporate government contractors. (Title I, Sec. 104)

The prohibition against campaign contributions in the Federal Corrupt Practices Act, as it was enacted into law during the administration of President Theodore Roosevelt. applied only to corporations. It later became apparent that this prohibition should be broadened to include labor organizations. Thus, over a Democratic presidential veto, a provision was placed in the War Labor Disputes Act that specifically extended the prohibition in the Corrupt Practices Act to labor unions. Then, in 1947, and again over a Democratic presidential veto, the prohibition against campaign contributions by labor unions was made a permanent part of the law.

That political expenditures by labor unions and related groups are substantial and require continued Congressional atention is reflected by the following excerpt from the report entitled "Financing the 1964 Election" by the Citizens' Research Foundation of Princeton, New Jersey:

"Labor groups and other miscellaneous non-party committees contribute to campaign chests, or wage parallel campaigns on behalf of selected candidates and causes. The Democratic financial picture, in particular, is not complete without data on labor financing. . ."

"In 1964, 31 national-level labor committees made gross disbursements of $3.7 million, compared with 21 committees disbursing $2.3 million in 1960. Labor transfers out, consisting mostly of allocations to other committees and candidates, were $2.9 million, or more than twice as much as in 1960; allocations to candidates for Congress were about twice their 1960 level. In 1964 and 1960, numerous labor committees spent more than they raised, indicating accruals from collections in non-election years."

In addition, the Republic bill would restrict the ban on political contributions by Federal contractors to Federal elections. Moreover, this restriction on political contributions by Federal contractors and unions that represent the employees of such contractors would not become operative unless the government contract required payments from the United States in excess of $100,000.

I believe that businessmen and unions should be placed on the same footing. One should not be prohibited from making political contributions at the State or local level because he is negotiating, or has negotiated, a contract with the Federal government. Moreover, it is ridiculous to prohibit an individual from making a political contribution at any level because he happens to have a small contract to provide janitorial services for the local post office or has entered into an agreement to lease a vacant lot to the government for use as a parking lot. Yet, this would be the result under Sec. 611, Title I of the Administration's bill.

Restrictions on contributions to State and local elections should be controlled at the State level. A contract with the Federal government should not disqualify anyone from contributing to a State or local campaign.

Similarly, I do not believe that a small contractor with the Federal government should be barred from making a political contribution. I would apply the de minimus rule in this situation. Thus, I would not prohibit contributions by contractors other than corporations where the United States payment under the contract is less than $100,000.

3. CANDIDATE AND EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT OFFICIALS REQUIRED TO FILE

The gift and income filing requirements of the Administration bill are expanded under my bill to apply to those Executive Department employees who occupy the offices and positions that are included in the five salary levels of the Federal Executive Salary Act of 1964. The occupants of these positions are the policymakers in the Executive Branch. They have the power of decision and most of them are presidential appointees.

The failure to extend the disclosure provisions of the bill to the Executive Branch is justified in the President's message as follows: "In the Executive Branch, the acceptance of gifts of more than nominal value is already strictly forbidden by Executive Order 11222 of May 8, 1965."

We fail to see how the fact that acceptance of gifts is forbidden by executive order is a sufficient reason for not extending the proposed provision to those in the Executive Branch. An executive order does not have the force and effect of a law nor does it contain criminal penalties. Certainly, public confidence in our government would be enhanced if reporting were required. Moreover, the President's statement, "For such reports to be made by members of the legislative branch can do much to demonstrate that wealthy interests are not permitted to affect—or even appear to affect—the conduct of government through their largesse" applies with equal force to the executive branch of the government.

In addition, those seeking election to the House of Representatives and to the Senate would be required to file a report disclosing the gifts and income received in the twelve months prior to the date he became a candidate. Certainly, this information should be available to the electorate. It is the same type of information that an incumbent is required to file.

4. CONVENTIONS AND PARTY CAUCUSES PLACED UNDER THE DISCLOSURE PROVISIONS

The definition of election has been clarified so that the provisions of the Act clearly apply to conventions and party caucuses held to nominate a candidate. (Title I, Sec. 101(a) and Title II, Sec. 201(a)).

Although in his message the President stated that his bill would bring convention nomination contests under the disclosure law, a closer reading of the submitted bill reflects that this may not be the case. In order to clarify this apparent ambiguity, or possible oversight, the language of the Republican bill specifically includes nominating conventions and party caucuses.

5. DEFINITION OF CANDIDATE CLARIFIED

The definition of a candidate as an "individual who seeks election" has been clarified by setting forth the specific actions that, if taken, will be construed as seeking nomination or election. (Title I, Sec. 101(b), Title II, Sec. 201(b), and Title III, Sec. 301(d)).

Thus, an individual shall be considered a candidate who (1) has taken the required action under a State law or (2) has received contributions and made expenditures or who has given his consent for any other person to do so with a view to bringing about his nomination or election.

6. LIMITATION ON CAMPAIGN CONTRIBUTIONS CLARIFIED

The $5,000 limitation on contributions to a particular candidate has been clarified so that such limitation applies only to a committee or committees whose activities are primarily in support of such candidate. Thus, an individual would be permitted to give $5,000 to the campaign committee of a particular candidate and then make an additional contribution to a Congressional Campaign Committee or a State or National Committee. (Title I, Sec. 102(a)).

7. PROHIBITION AGAINST SALES BY CANDIDATES OR COMMITTEES CLARIFIED

The prohibition against sales of any kind by a candidate or political committee has been revised so that normal arm's-length transactions by the candidate as well as the "usual and known business trade or profession" dealings of a candidate will be permitted. (Sec. 102(d)).

Under the Administration bill, a candidate could be prohibited from selling his home or his car or engaging in many other legitimate business transactions that are totally unrelated to his campaign. Similarly, a Campaign Committee could be prevented from selling used typewriters or waste paper. This type of normal business activity would be permitted under the Republican bill.

8. TAX DEDUCTIONS FOR POLITICAL CONTRIBUTIONS

The Republican bill would provide a special tax deduction in an amount up to $100, for contributions to any candidate qualified by law to seek public office or to any organization supporting such candidate, in any election campaign or primary—Federal, State or local. This deduction would be allowed in addition to the standard deduction and would not be limited to those who itemize their deductions. (Title IV.)

A tax deduction for political contributions was advocated by the Republican Coordinating Committee in December 1965 and by the House Republican Policy Committee in its statement on "Election Reform and Deductions for Political Contributions."

That there is a growing interest in elections, and a willingness to participate through campaign contributions, is illustrated by the fact that in the 1964 campaign, a large percent of the total funds collected by the Republican Party was in contributions of $100 or less. Thus, for 800,000 Republican contributors, the average contribution was $11. Significantly, a recent report by the Citizens' Research Foundation of Princeton, N.J., states that in 1964: The Democrats received approximately 69 percent of the dollar value of their total individual contributions in amounts of $500 and over. The Republicans, by contrast, received only 28 percent of the dollar value of their total individual contributions in these large sums.

Certainly, small contributions must be encouraged. Providing a $100 tax deduction is, we believe, a logical and fair way to achieve this result. It would encourage individuals in all walks of life to contribute. Moreover, it would prevent candidates from becoming too dependent upon a few large contributors.

Mr. Chairman, undoubtedly as these hearings continue, there will be additional questions posed and many improvements suggested. Certainly, this is a very difficult field in which to legislate. However, the importance and the need for this legislation cannot be over-emphasized. It is my hope that the improvements which have been suggested in my bill, H.R. 16203, will be helpful to the subcommittee as it continues with its important work. I respectfully request that this bill be accepted as a part of my statement and that it be included at this point in the RECORD.

The Powell Case: Bungling All Around

PAUL DUKE

ONE HOUR before the House took up the Adam Clayton Powell case on March 1, Democratic Representative John Brademas of South Bend, Indiana, received a telephone call from a Negro minister who felt that the punishment recommended by a special nine-man committee was too harsh. It was the only such protest received by Brademas from his Negro constituents or, for that matter, from anyone.

The failure to muster substantial Negro backing proved to be an unexpected handicap to the Harlem Democrat's efforts to be seated during the first two months of the new session. Not only was Powell deprived of any effective counterforce to the vociferous mail from whites demanding that he be kept out of Congress, but at least some House members were convinced that they could join in the assault without serious political injury from Negro voters. The case can even be made that the lack of Negro pressure was more crucial than the white pressure in the defeat by twenty votes of the special committee's plan to seat Powell while subjecting him to severe penalties and censure.

Wails came from Ralph Bunche, Martin Luther King, and many other Negro leaders only after the House decision to deny Powell a seat. The protests seemed incongruous in view of the earlier silence but showed that the leaders, surprised by the severity of the House action, now felt that the case transcended Powell himself and was rather an issue of a Negro being punished by white men, some with notorious records of bias. The protests also indicated that Powell would have at least the semblance of a united front when the House considered the case again in the wake of his re-election.

The principal explanation for Powell's initial failure to gain significant Negro support lay in his estrangement from the civil-rights movement. When new leaders appeared in the late 1950's, Powell's response was to scoff at the challengers and to continue his old style of brash aloofness. Few expected him to take to the streets, but there was some expectation that for his own protection he might at least make some perfunctory gestures. He didn't bother. He didn't even show up to vote for the civil-rights bills of 1965 and 1966.

On January 10—the very day Congress convened and the day the House first refused to seat Powell—the Washington Post appeared with a front-page story that quoted him as lampooning "weak knees" Wilkins, Martin "Loser" King, and "Whitey" Young. The consequence was a disposition throughout the civil-rights movement to let Powell fight his own battle.

As Roy Wilkins put it: "It is hardly to be wondered that the civil-rights organizations did not spend sleepless nights in his defense. He thought himself all-powerful, all-wise. He didn't need help. Adam always spread the aura about himself that he had everything well in hand."

Even so, it is likely that the civil-rights groups would have rallied strongly to his side had the multitudes been stirred to battle. That they were not is evidence of what many leaders view as a growing sophistication among a Negro electorate no longer easily swayed by traditional demagoguery. Scattered surveys showed, in fact, that rank-and-file Negroes were not nearly so upset about Powell's plight as some accounts implied, despite a demonstration by a thousand persons on the Capitol steps on opening day. "Sure, most Negroes are mad at the refusal to seat Adam because they think it's a cruel application of the double standard," a Negro Congressman told me. "But this doesn't mean they like Adam all that much. There are a lot of them who think he's a disgrace to our people and ought to be punished."

The logical deduction is that Powell's megalomania led him into major miscalculations. One notable example was his brief flirtation with extremism last fall. Proclaiming himself the father of black power, Powell invited civil-rights leaders to attend a black-power conference in the suite of the House Education and Labor Committee. Not one prominent rights official showed up. This further widened the breach with the Negro leadership and alienated many members of Congress who looked with disfavor on the chairman of the Education and Labor Committee serving as sponsor of such a meeting on Congressional property.

NOR DID Powell gauge the extent of the antipathy building up against him when the Democratic majority on his committee rebelled a few weeks later against his excesses and voted to curb his powers. When, finally, in December, a housekeeping committee began delving into Powell's travel vouchers, the chairman's reaction was to laugh off the whole thing as an unpleasant joke and to pursue even more vigorously the pleasures of Bimini, his favored island in the Bahamas.

By the time he returned to Washington on January 8, Powell's problems had multiplied. The housekeeping committee had confirmed suspicions about the abuse of government funds, and the New York courts had cited him for criminal contempt growing out of Powell's fight over a defamation judgment that had swollen to $164,000. A number of House members were now openly calling for his exclusion from Congress. Powell seemed unfazed. Arriving at the airport, he was as bouncy and breezy as ever, and even C. Sumner Stone, his chief aide, had a hard time convincing him that he was in deep trouble. When the truth finally sank in, Powell's tack was to resort to his customary line of defense—that he was being persecuted because of his race.

Despite Powell's blunders, it is entirely possible that he would have been seated but for the Democratic leadership's ineptitude in handling the case. Speaker John W. McCormack in particular seemed oblivious to the rising tide of opinion demanding that Powell be removed from office. To one member who visited him, the Speaker contended at some length that it was inconceivable that a duly elected member would be denied his seat. Although Democrat Lionel Van Deerlin of California announced on November 30 that he intended to offer a resolution to prevent seating, it was not until January 5 that McCormack called him in and tried to dissuade him. When a delegation from the House's liberal bloc, the Democratic Study Group, argued for some compromise to head off strong action on the floor, McCormack seemed stunned, making it clear that he was opposed to even mild disciplinary action.

Farewell to Moderation

If the Speaker was indeed unaware of the seriousness of the uprising, he was jolted to reality at the party caucus on January 9, when Democrats rejected by 122 to 88 a motion reluctantly supported by McCormack to suspend Powell as chairman of the Education and Labor Committee. The caucus voted instead to remove him altogether as chairman after some Democrats argued that only such drastic action could save his seat. The chamber's mood plainly assured approval for Van Deerlin's plan to keep Powell on the sidelines while an investigative panel studied his conduct and made recommendations.

The special committee's conclusion on February 23 that Powell should be seated, censured, fined $40,000, and stripped of seniority was widely hailed as the most judicious compromise that could be framed. But again the Democratic command underestimated popular sentiment. With Southern Democrats almost unanimously against any kind of arrangement that would seat Powell and with the Republicans sharply split, the burden fell on Northern and Western Democrats, who normally support the leadership on crucial issues. But the 222-202 defeat of the motion to seat Powell found twenty-eight of these Democrats in the opposition column. Similarly, twelve of the twenty Democratic chairmen of legislative committees sided against the leadership.

The defeat of the special committee's recommendation removed the last vestige of moderation in solving the crisis. The House proceeded to approve, 307-116, the hastily drafted motion of Republican Thomas B. Curtis of Missouri that Powell be barred from the Ninetieth Congress. "At no time—neither on January 10 nor on March 1—did the leadership come up with any strategy for trying to prevent this mess," remarked one Northern Democrat.

The House decision was a classic example of overkill. Especially distressing was the chamber's disregard for the Constitutional issues raised in the committee's thirty-five-page report. Not only did the panel find that Powell had met the basic Constitutional requirements of age, residency, and citizenship, but it suggested that the nearly half a million persons in New York's Eighteenth District would be denied the fundamental right of representation if he was not seated. This was a tacit recognition of the fact that Powell's constituents were not likely to turn their backs on him even if Congress did.

IN ITS WAY, the committee's course represented a masterful conciliation of opposing approaches. The nine members, headed by the dean of the House, Emanuel Celler of Brooklyn, were divided largely along partisan lines. The camp of hardliners included all four Republican members—Arch Moore of West Virginia, Charles M. Teague of California, Clark MacGregor of Minnesota, and Vernon W. Thomson of Wisconsin—plus Democrat Claude Pepper of Florida. They believed that the House should in some fashion keep Powell from taking his seat. The committeemen who favored a lesser punishment were Celler and the other three Democrats, James C. Corman of California, Andrew Jacobs, Jr., of Indiana, and John Conyers, Jr., of Michigan. Thus, at the start the committee stood five to four against seating Powell.

The majority's proposals for barring him dominated the committee's early sessions. But for one reason or another, various ideas proved impractical. Moreover, a study of the precedents for punishment provided impressive evidence that the House would be on dangerous ground in refusing to seat anyone for questionable morals.

The framers of the Constitution recognized as much when they debated the question. The 1787 convention delegates rejected as "improper and dangerous" suggestions that the national legislature be given power to set qualifications beyond the enumerated ones for membership. On several occasions during the nineteenth century the House resisted the temptation to exclude members-elect after a majority acknowledged the Constitutional limitations. As early as 1807 a House report declared that deviation could mean "any sort of dangerous qualification might be established—of property, color, creed, or political professions." A more recent application of the Constitutional leash occurred in 1933, when the House voted to seat Francis N. Shoemaker of Minnesota after concluding that his conviction for a felony did not deprive him of "citizenship."

The records revealed that on the few occasions when admission was denied, the House was motivated largely by public hysteria. A wave of anti-Mormon feeling, for example, cost Brigham Roberts of Utah, who had three wives, a seat in 1900; and anti-radical attitudes kept out Socialist Victor Berger of Wisconsin in 1919.

The Harsh Half-Measures

"The more we studied, the more we realized Powell should be seated," said MacGregor. Accordingly, the hard-liners caved in.

The resulting coalescence of viewpoint on the seating issue left the committee only with the matter of fixing punishment. This was no easy chore. Conyers, the lone Negro member of the panel, felt that a stiff censure would suffice. Celler and Corman wanted to go further, but questioned taking the unprecedented step of docking Powell's pay to reimburse the government. The four Republicans, having retreated on seating, made it plain that they would accept nothing less than the full measure of punishment, and ultimately they prevailed. Committee sources suggest that the severity of the sentence would have been tempered with at least some mercy had Powell, in his lone appearance before the group, displayed any willingness to co-operate with the inquiry.

To some, the outstanding merit of the committee verdict was its very harshness. As they reasoned, Powell would never submit abjectly to such humiliation after having been defiant for so long, and thus would involuntarily retire from Congress. "What proved to be sound Constitutionally turned out to be the best practically," observed one member. "It could have made him a quitter instead of a martyr."

The subtleties of such thinking were obliterated in the tide of emotionalism that engulfed the House floor in the ensuing March 1 debate. Those conservatives prone to hold up the Constitution as the great shield of American freedom did not appear impressed with the argument advanced by MacGregor in one of the few memorable speeches. "Many of you in this chamber have joined me in criticizing the Supreme Court for its broad constructions of the Constitution," he said. "We have called for strict interpretations, and will again. How anomalous it would be for those of us in this chamber who have berated the Court for its broad constructions to now act on the question of Mr. Powell's exclusion under the broadest interpretation possible."

THE DEBATE ranged mainly from the extraneous to the ridiculous. Republican Representative Durwood G. Hall of Missouri, one of the more notorious Constitution-wavers, assailed Powell for calling his colleagues "hypocrites." Curtis cited a violation of the Ten Commandments. Many saw the issue primarily as one of protecting the integrity of Congress, implying that the removal of Powell from the scene would reverse the low rating given the Legislative branch in opinion polls. Few contended, as Conyers did, that to reject the committee's solution would be "to throw the Constitution into the wastebasket."

It is questionable whether the case will produce any historic confrontation between the courts and Congress, even though Celler's committee warned that refusal to grant seating might lead to a Constitutional crisis. There are no clear guidelines because there has never been a test of Congressional authority in such matters. The suit filed by Powell's lawyers in Federal District Court in Washington on March 8 was the first directly to challenge the power of the legislators to go beyond the enumerated qualifications in barring members.

Some scholars believe that the Federal judiciary could agree with Alexander Hamilton's assertion that "the qualifications of the persons... are defined and fixed by the Constitution," and direct that Powell be seated. In its landmark decision of 1962 ordering the reapportionment of state legislatures, the Supreme Court discarded the old restraints against entering "the political thicket." Moreover, it explicitly claimed for itself the role of "ultimate interpreter" of the Constitution. It should also be noted that in its unanimous ruling last December 5 that the Georgia legislature could not bar membership to Julian Bond for pacifism, the court asserted supremacy in judging the qualifications for a legislative assembly.

A large body of legal opinion, however, holds that the courts would decline to intervene in what is essentially an internal action by a co-equal branch of government. The judiciary has tended historically to take the broad view when challenges have been directed at Congressional authority. And even if the House did go outside the Constitutional rules for membership, there is no general mandate for the courts to redress such violations. Federal Judge George Hart suggested in arguments before the District Court on April 4 that intervention might be an assertion of "unequal power" by the judiciary that would contravene the sovereign immunity of Congress. In addition to its lawmaking function, Congress has a number of institutional powers that are quasi-judicial in nature. Among these are the powers to judge the elections, votes, and qualifications of its members. The courts have long acknowledged that in its consideration of these matters a branch of Congress becomes, in effect, a judicial tribunal. Thus the courts could hold that the Powell case is not justiciable because it is outside their jurisdiction.

There is an important distinction between the political rights upheld in the reapportionment ruling and in the Bond case and those cited by Powell's lawyers. The Supreme Court is plainly superior to state legislatures and has the power to enforce its decrees relating to the states. It was, as the court stated in Baker v. Carr in 1962, a question of "the consistency of state action with the Constitution." Powell's case involved a separate but equal branch of government and posed the question, as Judge Hart observed, whether the courts would now go deeper "into that thicket."

At the Door Again

From a practical standpoint, there would be no assurance that the House would honor a Supreme Court declaration affirming that Powell's rights had been violated. The House might instead defy the judiciary. It is not inconceivable that many members who have lambasted Supreme Court rulings on race, religion, and crime would welcome the opportunity to give the justices their comeuppance.

In any event, the legal complexities were not expected to be resolved prior to a resubmission of the case to the House following Powell's victory in a special election to fill the vacancy. If the chamber reversed its stand, the Constitutional questions would become academic. With most civil-rights groups now behind Powell, Democratic leaders hoped that the outcome would be different this time. The atmosphere in the House remained charged with anti-Powell sentiment, however, and Powell's continuing arrogance and pronouncements from Bimini about a Negro third-force movement only made things more difficult for those who were trying to persuade the House to heed the letter of the Constitution rather than the letters of constituents.

India's Opposition Scents Power

SUNDAR RAJAN

BOMBAY

THE FEBRUARY national election, resulting in unexpectedly large gains for a widely divergent assortment of Congress Party enemies, has brought in its wake a number of unusual events. Some hours before the new legislative assembly of West Bengal State opened its budget session on March 8, policemen quietly withdrew from the legislative building. Wild with enthusiasm, more than ten thousand Calcuttans flocked in to witness the first meeting of what was described by the Communist Finance Minister as a "people's assembly." One columnist noted how factory workers, rickshaw pullers, and bootblacks went round the chamber and affectionately touched the speaker's chair. Later, when Governor Padmaja Naidu, a federal appointee, ceremonially entered the House to deliver her inaugural speech, there were cries of "Long live the revolution!" from the public galleries. A few days earlier, the thirteen-party left-wing government's action program had been presented to forty thousand people at an "open-air legislature" held on one of the city's huge playgrounds.

To members of West Bengal's humbled Congress Party, occupying the opposition benches for the first time since independence nineteen years ago, the scenes were galling. Like their counterparts in seven other states where the party has lost power as a result of India's fourth general election, they began to wonder whether the parliamentary system nourished with typical British care was not being degraded by such displays. "A virus seems to have taken hold of the country. May God save our people!" cried the defeated Congress Party Chief Minister of Madras State. But this was only a panicky reaction. Soon, Congress leaders were sending congratulatory messages to the new Chief Ministers of West Bengal, Kerala, Orissa, Madras, Bihar, and Punjab. (Haryana and Uttar Pradesh were lost later.) There were long-distance calls from Prime Minister Indira Gandhi assuring them of the federal government's good will and co-operation. Congress Party Chairman Kumaraswami Kamaraj announced that in all the opposition-controlled states his party men would function "in the best parliamentary tradition." He told party leaders to set a "fine example" to the opposition—implying that, unlike their political rivals, Congress members would not seek to paralyze legislative bodies through violent tactics.
